Poetry.

Little Mistress Sans-Merci.

Little Mistress Sans-Merci,
Trotting world-wide, lassy free;
Trotting coming to and fro,
And her coming to and fro,
Never ruled there yet, I know,
Mightier monarch in the land;
And my heart is with her,
Miss Sans-Merci!

Little Mistress Sans-Merci,
She hath made a slave of me
"Go!" she biddeth, and I go—
"Come!" and I am fain to come—
Never merry doth she show,
Be she worth of follies;
Yet an I content to be
Slave to Mistress Sans-Merci!

Little Mistress Sans-Merci,
She hath grown so dear to me
That I count as passing sweet
All the time she spends with me.
And I bless the little feet
That go tramping on my heart,
Ah, how lovely life would be
But for little Sans-Merci!

Little Mistress Sans-Merci,
Cuddle close this night to me,
For I wish I were you, long
Ruthless that had trod upon
Shall outpour a soothing song
And shut the door unconsciously
At its tenderness for me.
All its tenderness for me!

—Eugene Field.

Soliloquy.

A BOX OF BONBONS.

"Why," cried Eleanor Goodie, "it's a perfect like this!"
"Is it?" echoed Miriam Kason.
"I wish, dear, I could ask you to stay and spend the day, but I dare not. I'm too much of a stranger here to take any liberties."

"Oh, I shouldn't expect it," said Eleanor, looking around at the decorated ceiling, pale blue silk draperies and lovely bits of landscapes on the walls. "I know exactly how you're situated, Miriam. Bob has given me some cash to buy a new gown with, and there are some of the sweetest old blue gingham at Tuck & Nipp's."

Miss Kason shook her head.
"Impossible!" said she. "You see, the family have gone to Barrington to a funeral, and I am left in charge. And you don't know," she added, with a comical little pouting of the lips, "how afraid I am of Mrs. Yerkes, the housekeeper, or how my heart beats when I feel myself compelled to give an order to the butler!"

"It would be such fun!"
"One hardly knows," sighed Miriam, "whether one is a lady or servant."
"Oh, there can't be much doubt of that," said Eleanor. "Look at yourself in the mirror. Wouldn't you say that you looked a princess in disguise?"

"Nonsense. But at least let me get you a glass of cool water, Nell, you look so flushed with your long walk."

She slipped away, while Eleanor begged the time for her absence by a lengthened survey of herself in the mirror.

Yes, it was no unsatisfactory view—a dimpled, rosy round Venus, with sparkling hazel eyes, red lips and complexion of purest pink and white. And then—good gracious!—one of the ribbon loops of her airy summer dress had come loose. She looked frantically round for a pin to repair the damage, but no pin was to be seen.

"They're in the bureau drawer," she said to herself. "Miriam was always too disinterested to get anything for herself. Here they are!" grasping a paper of pins.

And here, too—oh, the delicious little glutton!—here's a box of chocolate caramels, tied with pink ribbons. I'll teach her to hide her sweeties away from me! How she will stare when she finds them gone.

It was the act of a moment to whisk the bonbon box into her shopping bag and appear deeply absorbed in repairing the damage to her wardrobe when Miss Kason came in, bringing a glass of water and some fancy biscuits on a Japanese tray.

By the time she reached the famous smorgasbord of Messrs. Tuck & Nipp the "bargains" in old blue gingham were gone, and nothing remained "fit to be seen" at any price to which she could venture to aspire, and so she betook herself sorrowfully to the pretty flat which she called home.

And none too soon, for a telegram waited her there, announcing that her mother was ill, and it was necessary for her to go to her at once.

At the end of two weeks she brought her mother home nearly recovered.

Little Biddy, the youngest sister recovered her joyful life.

"It's been so lonesome without you, Nell," she said. "I've kept house beautifully every morning, and the coffee hasn't missed quite coming, and bringing a glass of water he couldn't find time to go walking with me."

"Busy!" satirically echoed Eleanor. "But, he really was! He got a real case, Bob has, and it's awful interesting. The judge assigned it to him because the defendant—think that's the proper law phrase—with a pretty little wrinkle of the eyebrows—hadn't any means to provide one for herself. And she's ever so pretty, Bob says, and he's quite sure she isn't guilty, and won't be strange—neither her curly head against her mother's shoulder—if Bob didn't fall in love with his first client?"

Eleanor looked distressed.

"Mother," said she, "didn't I tell you what would come of your allowing Sarah to read so many novels? In love, indeed! Most likely the woman is an adventuress."

"All the same," persisted Sarah, "Bob says it's a very interesting case, and it's all the same, I'm glad Bob has a good opening in the courts. And now, mamma, you must have a cup of tea and lie down awhile before dinner."

"Oh, cried Eleanor, impatiently stamping her foot, how impracticable you all are! Why shouldn't she be guilty? Can't a pretty girl be wicked as well as a plain one? As if I could! But I'm opening in the courts. And now, mamma, you must have a cup of tea and lie down awhile before dinner."

"Oh, cried Eleanor, impatiently stamping her foot, how impracticable you all are! Why shouldn't she be guilty? Can't a pretty girl be wicked as well as a plain one? As if I could! But I'm opening in the courts. And now, mamma, you must have a cup of tea and lie down awhile before dinner."

"I'd wager my existence," said Mr. Robert Goodie, making a desperate attack on the cold ham and radishes that garnished the breakfast table, "that she's innocent. Only here comes up this question, where are the jewels?"

"Yes," said Eleanor incredulously, "that's the question, where are the jewels? How you men are dazed by a pair of bright eyes!"

Mr. Goodie had given his sister a long account of the legal tangle, complicating it still further by learned technicalities and a ceaseless repetition of my client, "the defendant," and the "complaint," to all of which she had given but a half attention, and at the end of this meal she rose hurriedly.

"I'll go out for a little," said she. "I want to see a dear friend of mine, who must think I'm neglecting her shockingly."

In the soft July sunset she went to the big house. The street stood and timidly pressing the electric button inquired for Miss Kason.

The tall butler froze her with a glance. "Ain't been here for a long time," said he and shut the door unconsciously at its tenderness for me.

And she returned home in great amazement.

In her absence Mr. Robert Goodie had been "turning the place upside down," as little Sarah expressed it, in search of a box to carry his papers.

"The lock of mine is out of order," said he, "and I can't get it back before Wednesday. Any one of your bags will do. Nonsense!" So you think I want a family trunk?"

There's Nell's shopping bag," said the little girl. "It's littler than mother's and bigger than mine."

"Get it then—quick! there's a dear little dot. Oh, don't stop to dust it."

"But must," pleaded the housewife little thing. "It was on the top of the wardrobe, where Nell put it before she went to bring mother home. And it's a awful dusty! And I think there's something in it too."

She was fumbling at the catch when Robert caught it from her.

"Phaw!" said he impatiently. "A box of candy!"

He tore the pink ribbon knot apart, the lid dropped off, and little Sarah, standing on tiptoe to look into the bag, stepped back with a shriek. Something from the inside seemed to flash up into their eyes like imprisoned fire.

At the same time Eleanor came into the room, fingering her hat and scarf wearily down.

"So," cried Robert, looking up with a face that would have furnished a study to any physiognomist, "you are the one who stole the Grafton diamonds!"

"What do you mean? Have you gone crazy?" gasped Eleanor. "What are you doing in my room?"

"I found the diamonds in a box in your leather bag," said her brother—the diamond necklace for the theft of which poor Miss Kason is on trial."

"Miss Kason! You never mean that it is Miriam Kason—my friend Miriam!"

"Didn't I tell you so this very day?" cried Goodie.

"You never mentioned her name at all. You kept saying 'my client,' the defendant. But, oh Bob, I know it all now! I was there—the big house—when she went for mother. I was in Miriam's room, and I opened her bureau drawer to find a pin, and I thought it would be a joke to take her box of candy away. I never opened it. I never dreamed what was in it, and when she came over me in the night, from Aunt Laura I just flung the bag down and thought no more of the whole thing. Oh, poor darling Miriam! But how came the diamonds in her possession?"

"Don't you know? But how should you? You said 'my client,' the defendant. But, oh Bob, I know it all now! I was there—the big house—when she went for mother. I was in Miriam's room, and I opened her bureau drawer to find a pin, and I thought it would be a joke to take her box of candy away. I never opened it. Palpitation OF THE Heart, Nervous Exhaustion and Stomach Trouble.
My daughter, Mrs. Mars, has been suffering from the above diseases for years, and employed all the Leading Physicians in Rockland and specialists in Boston, but got no relief. They said it was caused by a bad state of the blood. She could not sleep nights; bowels constipated, and palpitation of the heart so bad she could hardly walk. She has taken a bottle of Skoda's Discovery, and Skoda's Little Tablets. Now she can work every day, eat well and sleep soundly. I can never express my gratitude. MRS. S. E. CROWELL, Rockland, Me.
