Mrs. Chapin, one of the W. C. T. U. workers, was once entertained in Mississippi as she home of a young married couple, and the wife said to her: "Now, Mrs. Chapin, I'm willing to entertain you, but I don't want you to talk temperance, for it you should convert my busband then I'd have to banish wine from our table, and all friends would call me a crank " Mrs. Chapin spoke at the public meeting and then made her way through the audience trying to get signers to the pledge. She begged the young husband to sign, and he was reaching for the pencil to do so when his wife objected and with a smile he shook his head, and said, "No." Six years afterward Mrs. Chapin passed through the same place. She was the guest this time of another family, bus after her address was over a weeping woman and a gibbering drunken man came up to greet her. It was the same couple who had entertained her six years before "O" said the wife, "try to get my husband to sign the piedge." "No," he cried, "I wanted to be saved once, but you wouldn't let me.
