SAMUEL & JAMES WATTS,

Poetry.

A Politican's Advice.

Young man, if you would be renowned,

'Morgst whom your foot-steeps chance

And by your fellow-mortale crowned,

And flittered be by nearly all

If you would be accounted great,

And competent to rule the state

If high positions you would hold

You must not think an honest man

Of goodness now it has too much-

If you don't keep your promise true, Just promise more and that will do-

You must, of course, attend the church,

Lest "ir filel" your name beemirch,

And if the membership you'd bribe

You must quite liberally subscribe

You must denounce the whiskey leech;

But when the voting day comes round Upon the liquor side be found-

For many temperance men, my friend,

In moments of weakness they declared,

If e'er by fortune they were spared

They'd banish wine without delay,

But when they got to Parliament,

If they would lie a little.

If many through the furnace came

Besmirched and asything but pure, When only was their office sure,

By lying just a little?

So now, if politice, my friend, To enter forthwith, you interd,

This counsel take and don't despise,

But keep it e'er before your eyes -

Splegt Tale.

Won An Heiress.

HENRY HARVEY STUART.

Of their rash vows they did repent,

For to their sight loomed up from far

What if they did? and can you blame,

Nor keep a little.

For each a boodle-laden star,

To get to Parliament, straight away

Of kee sest powers, have discerned

Was not of use another hour-

No use has politics for such ;

A chance 'monget demagogues can stand

Lie a little.

Lie a listle.

Lie a listle.

And lie a little.
