In view of the possibility of war between these two nations, a comparison of their namilitary strength is not without in terest. On land both countries could put been committed in Osick, near Kalisch, Po- and others followed.

At the moment, all the church bells in Japan could do that a comparison seems is no clue to the murderers farcical. The total strength of the army which the Czar could put in the field should occasion require it. would be 71 times greater than any which the Mikado could muster

The total force available for the military service of the Czar, including the active service, the reserves and men for the national defense, is 2 798,000. To meet this force Japan could muster not more than 373.720 Even these figures, great as the comparison is, do not give the full extent of Russia's advantage. For the war of the present day the trained and organized troops are super-ior to the new levies, which lack not only the training and organiz tion, but the equip-ments to fit them for the field as well. In this class Russia has still a greater advan tage than that shown in the grand total of the forces of the two nations. In what she classes as her active service—that is, men thoroughly organized, disciplined and equipped—she has the enormous number of 1,-269,000, while in the same class Japan has

In naval strength the comparison is not nearly so one sided, although the Russian navy is far shead of that of Japan in both men and ships. The number of Russian ships is 3} times greater than that of Japan, Russia having 240 vessels of all classes, to 70 for Japan. But such figures express a greater advantage than Russia possesses, for her navy is not as modern as that of Japan, and, besides, she has a greater proportion of light boats of the torpedo class than Japan has. Of the boats now being built both nations have almost an equal number, Russia having 39 and Japan 36 now under construc-

In men, Russia has a naval force of 41,915 nlisted men to man the guns of her fleet, while Japan has but about 15,000 in the same class. But Japan has a larger class of seafaring men to recruit her naval service from than has Russia. In case of war the little island empire could place a large force of seafaring men affort, recruited from the multitude of fishing and coasting craft in

But any comparison of men and ships be tween the two nations would be far from complete without some reference to the con-ditions under which they would probably fight, as well as the inability of Russia to atilize her entire army in a warfare with the

A war between these two nations would undoubtedly be fought in the east, to reach which Russia would have to transport her troops across the wide reaches of Sibera.

At the present time that would not be an easy matter to accomplish, for as yet the Siberian railway, of which so much is exgiart of it which is finished is not equipped or the transportation of large bodies of troops. Russia would also have to maintain garrisons along the line of this road to pre vent its destruction by unfriendly natives maintain the Russian army in Poland and slong the Turkish border, all of which would reduce the total of the Russian force to a ing on the side of the Russi great degree and bring it much nearer the maximum force which Japan could put in the lieved to be unique in the history of the field against the armies of the Ozar. the part of Russia and Japan have turned the eyes of the civilized world eastward. These two nations, one of which has figured prominently in all the modern history of Europe, and the other of which has but recently awakened from a hibernating sleep of centuries, are the two powerful political factors in the eastern development, and both are eeeking supremacy in the portion of the globe which they would dominate.

Olose students of eastern politics have predicted that before the vexing questions were actived the two nations would clash over the state of the part of Russia and Japan have turned the principes of the civilized world eastward. These occurred recently on a steamboat at a Scot tish pier. A poor woman coming on board with a baby in her arms was bewildered by the return ticket the bustling pureer had thrust into her hand in exchange for her precious 'bawbees. She timidly asked and excorated, in the presence of the diplomatic corps, leading representatives of the Roman nobil ity, and a number of specially invited guests. After doming the pontifical robes, the Pope, borne on the Sedia Gestatoria, and escorted by the papal guards, proceeded with the car dinals and the court to the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican Palace, where were gathered representatives of the Roman religious o ders across, 'And this half you keep to bring and clargy.
