The first sharp pain of disappointment gave way to a long, dull, ceaseless agony that filled his heart to the brim and made it throb wildly at times within the tender walls. 'Oh, beloved Beatricia,' he would cry out

'He no goods; he no goods,' shouted the mob of merrymakers, tossing back their heads in unbridled, mocking laughter. They would look at one an other when he passed silently, and then raise their eyebrows significantly and smile with knowing, conclusive smiles as they touched their forebeads

Pietro scarcely knew of their presence. He used to hear their uproarious aughter, but it did not attract him. He had no respect for them. Many were but provincial born, and he, why, he. Pietro Gonzales, had been born in Rome itself, above the shop where Gonzales the elder had chiseled the heads of prelates of the Vatican from the finely veined, dazzling white ribs of marble from Italy's own hills and had loved art and labored for it in the oure joy of creating. Money to him was nothing. He did not know how to earn it well, or to keep it. Art was everything. He deemed it worth the sacrifice of his son, whom he forced to go to America in order to extract a fortune from the new world. But Pietro was beginning to learn that fortunes were slow in coming, even in young, thriving provinces, and his art was more than the art of chiseled marbles or of plaster casts. His love was his ambition. He placed it above his art, above his duty, above life itself.

And the object had only grown to mock him for his devotion. Often as he sauntered along the city treets, absorbed in thoughts of her, he would stop with a startled look and search the face of some passer by that reminded him vividly of his Beatricia. He saw her often in this way, for her image was really never absent from his mind's eye. In his reveries of her she used to appear to him, and, as in

But, like all lovers, he was selfish and sensitive, and he had sworn on his honor never to write to her again, and he could picture her often making love to Marcello and Valentino and others in the vineyards, as she had made love

A second summer of silence came, and Pietro wandered out into the country and walked among the wood ferns, crushing them to his breast with his passionate love for beauty. He would go and spend days under the sky, begging for food as he went. He could not work. He was steeped, saturated, overcome by the accumulated longing within him.
