Poetry.

The Mother's Prayer.

Beneath the midnight moon
The mother's prayer is heard, And now her prayer is heard Upon the grass they lay.
Tired of games and idle jest, As swept the hours along,
They cried to one who must depart,
"Come, friend, give us a song."

"I fear I cannot please," he said, "The only song I know
Are those my mother used to sing To me long years ago."
"Sing one of them," a rough voice said, "I have none but true men here."
"Thank you, friend, give us a song,"
"A mother's song are dear."

Then sweetly rose the singer's voice, Aid unthought calm,
"Am I a soldier of the Cross, A follower of the Lamb?"
Ended the song, the soldier said, As to his feet he turned,
"Thank you, friend, give us a song,"
"G'd grant us sweet repose."

"Sing us one more," the captain begged, The soldier bent his head, Then turning round with smiling lips,
"You'll join with me?" he said.
"We'll sing that old familiar air, Sweet as buds of May,
"All hail the power of Jesus' name, Let angels prostrate fall!"

And words were that old time's spell, As on the soldier sang; Man after man fell on his knees,
And laid their voices rang.
The songs were done, the camp is still,
Night has the stream is heard, But oh, the depths of every heart By those dear hymns are stirred.

And up from many a bearded lip,
In accents sweet and low, Are heard the prayers those mothers taught Those soldiers long ago.

Select Tale.

A LUCKY BLUNDER.

It was just 3.30 by the dusty clock that did duty in the editor's office of The Daily Telegraph, when John Hobbs, manager and general factotum for that enterprising paper, from which he derived some little income, suddenly remembered the day of the week.
It was Thursday and on the following evening the most select concert of the season would take place, where the social set of Wrenville would be in evidence.

Now for nearly a year John had been a frequent and more or less regular caller on Miss Mabel Whitney, the very pretty daughter of a very rich merchant.

He had intended to invite her all along, but this delay in his invitation might mean a disappointment.
He would know and who not embody in his note the declaration of his affection, and so put to the test whether she returned his love or not. This seemed a happy thought, so he began:

My dear friend - May I hope for the pleasure of your company at the concert tomorrow evening by the singers' club?
I am writing to ask you the answer to which will make me either the most miserable or happiest of men. If you accept my invitation to the concert, I shall understand your answer will not be 'No' to the more momentous question, and a refusal of my invitation I shall consider as a refusal of yours, with deepest regret.

JOHN HOBBS HOBBS.

For a man of so brilliant a mind this was really a very lame proposal, but John really was a man with a consciousness of having said just enough and not too much, feeling quite sure in the depths of his honest devotion to her that her answer would be what he hoped.

With this last of his mind he turned to the pen of his afternoon mail, with which his desk was littered.
Another story from the pen of Miss Davenport. Well, this one he had better reject, she was really getting deeper, or so it seemed to him.

He was sure, she sketched her characters with an artist's skill and was decidedly original in plot and action, but the public, the public, must be amused, and her reviews never seemed happy, and what was more, never married the heroes, nor any one else, for that matter. He did not want to personally say "no" to the girl, in whom unconsciously he had become so interested, and whom he recognized as a clever writer, sure to win for herself a name in the world. But he had already made up his mind not to accept more of her work, and so taking up the stub pen which had been lying on better days, he dashed off as follows:

My dear Madam - Notwithstanding our appreciation of and admiration for your style, we find we must discontinue acceptance for the present. Trusting to be of service to you some day. I am, yours very truly,
JOHN HOBBS HOBBS.

I flatter myself that is neatly done, thought John, so hastily enveloping the notes in their respective envelopes and addressing the same he rang for the office boy.

Friday morning dawned dull and rainy, with little prospect of clearing weather, and as John sat in his office his thoughts, and not a premonition of failure. Anyway he had dropped at the florist's an ordered box of gorgeous violet sent his love, and they must be received by this time.

Just then the postman opened the door. Not a line from her in this mail, only some advertisements, a bill or two, three cards that, and last of all, a small envelope in the well known handwriting of Miss Davenport. A reply to his dismissal of the day before, he presumed, and, fearing to open the note he read:

My dear Mr. Hobbs - The contents of your letter, although a very great surprise to me, have made me very happy. It is hardly necessary for me to add that I accept your invitation and shall expect you this evening. With regards from my mother and self, I am, most sincerely, MILDRED D. DAVENPORT.

What did it mean. What invitation did she accept and why should his letter make her very happy? Quite the reverse, he had supposed. It sounded like some mystery of romance from her versatile pen, but it was not jesting.

matter he reflected, remembering the concert and his anxiety of mind concerning the answer from Miss Whitney.
Just then, in a reflection, the door was flung open and a messenger boy rang out: "Mr. Hobbs! Very important.
No answer." And depositing a package handed John his book for signature. John recognized the handwriting of the address and hastily tore it open.
A large bunch of violet met his astonished gaze and a letter, which read as follows:

Mr. Hobbs:
Sir - Allow me to return your property, which by some mistake you sent to me. As to my style, I consider it presumptuous on your part to pass any comment on what cannot possibly be of interest or concern of yours. I most heartily endorse your disposition of all future correspondence, as your insults are only less clever than your compliments. Yours, etc.

MABELLE WHITNEY.

Poor John read it with sinking heart, too utterly miserable to express the surprise it merited. Another letter to read, he thought. Was the whole world turning topsy turvy and with it his powers of comprehension? First, a letter of acceptance for an invitation which he had not given, and now this withering refusal and angry rebuff of his poor, despised violet. Well, good-by to his dreams of love and future bliss and the castles he had built in his vain ambition. The disappointment which he had not given, and now this
