Poetry.

Wind Lyrics.

North wind—
Thou art full of pearl, with sapphire eyes,
I steal at dawn to fly, while yet
The clouds with silver dew are wet,
Or wings that break the morning star
Of long after.

South wind—
From fields of hazel stars I blow,
I bear the fragile flowers of snow,
That fall upon the earth below,
With pure celestial lips to bless
In soft caress.

West wind—
On wings of perfume, born of spring,
Sweet memories of the south I bring,
From birds and blossoms pink that cling,
To bow their gladness in an ecstasy
Of melody.

East wind—
Back through the gates of gold and rose,
I bring the star of evening glow,
I slip, before the evening close,
On pinions white of a night,
To the light I see to die.
But hark! The night will soon pass by,
Before the light, when morning breaks,
The east wind wakes.

—Carrie L. Ward in Dundas.

Salt Lake.

A DARK MISTAKE.

No use burning all these lights down here. I'll just have to fill them in the morning, and no use making me work for nothing. The old sexton turned down the one lamp burning in the chandelier in the room and went out, leaving the door ajar. The light flickered for a few moments until an outer door was opened, and then, with one bright flash, it died out.

Upstairs there was much laughing and talking as the busy hands put the finishing touches to the church decorations for the morning.

"There, I think that is as well as we can do," and Nellie Collier stepped back to survey the work. "We need a small piece of rope to reach across that seat," she said, turning to Dr. Graham, who was standing beside her. "Two of these letters in that center not to be crooked. You straighten them, please, while I get the rope. I know where there is a piece that will just do." She hurried down the stairs and ran against Mr. Pitcairn as he was entering his study.

"When I dark as can be," she said half aloud as she entered the small anteroom and felt her way over the closed under the stairs.

Mr. Pitcairn went into his study, his thoughts in a tumult. For months Nellie Collier's laughing face had been haunting him, and he often found that his eyes rested on her when he was preaching.

He waited a few minutes and then met the little white-robed figure as she was about leaving the room.

"Nellie, I want to tell you something," he said, taking hold of the hand which was full of rope.

"I have been wanting to tell you for a long time that I love you. I don't think that you can be surprised, for you must have seen that I love you dearly, and I hope that it has not been distasteful to you, has it?"

There was no answer, but there was no attempt to withdraw the hands that he held.

I am not an adept at love-making, darling. Will you be my wife, Nellie? "I never thought that you cared for me much, and I thought you cared for others," came in a low voice. "I must have had my feelings more than I thought, but it was because I loved you so that you thought that I neglected you. A minute's watchful as much and has to be very careful. But can you love me, darling, enough to be my wife?"

He could scarcely hear the answer, but he suddenly clasped her in his arms. No matter what happened for a few minutes. It was the first time that he had been in love, and the room was dark. He remembered after-ward that he even then felt surprised to find that she was so small.

"I must be going, darling," he said at last, as he heard some one entering the next room. "There is a committee meeting in my study. I will come up stairs as soon as I can," and, giving her a last kiss, he hurried from the room.

He was in no humor for a business meeting, and the cold breath that was blowing through the door seemed so light and warm. He was discussing important business when he suddenly remembered that when he was discussing important business, he was discussing important business.

The truth was he scarcely knew what was said or done, and as he stood at the last one had departed he hurried up stairs. Nearly every one had gone, but Nellie, this Nellie, was busy arranging some last flowers in a vase, and Dr. Graham stood beside her, and she was whispering something to her while she just shook her head and laughed.

Nellie merely glanced up as he approached.

"What do you think of the decorations?" she asked.

"They are fine, very fine," he answered, trying to meet her glance, but she had turned back to Dr. Graham, and for a moment he was angry.

"Fah! How unreasonable I am," he said to himself. "How much more thoughtful she is so as not to attract attention."

So he walked away until he saw her preparing to leave.

"Are you ready to go now?" he asked in a low voice. "Do you want to take this basket along?"

"Why, yes—but," she hesitated an instant. "Dr. Graham will help me with my things."

He suddenly dropped the basket.

"Why, Nellie, it is my place, not that fellow's," he exclaimed.

Nellie Collier's face flushed. "I do not see how you can claim that right any more than you have to speak of Dr. Graham in that manner," she said laughingly, but in that manner. "I think that what passed between us this evening would certainly give me the right."

"Why, Mr. Pitcairn, what could possibly have passed between us? You must be laboring under some mistake," she exclaimed in surprise. "I saw you when you came into the church and had scarcely spoken to you until you came here a few minutes ago."

"What do you mean, after what was said in the anteroom when you were after rope?"

"Mr. Pitcairn, if you had any conversation with any one down stairs it certainly was not with me. I went down after rope, but I was not gone two minutes, and you must remember that I was not the only one who had been down stairs after things, and if you have made any arrangements to accompany a young lady home this evening it was not with my humble servant," and her black eyes danced merrily, and he knew that she was enjoying his discomfort.

Mr. Pitcairn grew pale.

"I forgive you for calling Dr. Graham a fellow if you don't do it again, for he is—he hesitated and blushed—"a very particular friend of mine, and you and I have been such good friends that I will tell you a secret—we are engaged."

"Oh, you little torment! I might have known that you would try," he exclaimed, his face all aglow.

"Why Mr. Pitcairn, how could you have known, when we did not know it ourselves until this evening? And I don't know what the doctor will say to my telling you."

Mr. Pitcairn staggered back, against a seat. "I—I wish you every happiness," he murmured, then he turned to examining the flowers until after they had left the church. He felt dazed, and he certainly punched himself to see that he was not dreaming as he went down stairs to his study.

A pretty kettle of fish I've got into, he exclaimed, as he threw himself into a chair and kicked the footstool which Miss Reynolds had made across the room.

Lost the girl I wanted and engaged myself to something I don't want, and I haven't any idea who it is!

He lit a match and went over to the anteroom. There lay a piece of rope on the floor and beside it a daintily perfumed handkerchief. He picked them up and went back to his study.

He remembered now that he noticed the scent of violets as he held her in his arms. It cost him a struggle to give up Nellie Collier. He sat and thought until long after midnight. He studied over all the Nellies of his congregation. There was Miss Reynolds, but she was too stout, he thought, with a great sigh of relief; Miss Matern was too tall. It was some one whose head just reached his shoulder. He had called her Nellie, he was certain of that, with some love epithets thrown in. She was small and dainty and, who ever was, evidently loved him.

If he found she was some one who would suit him, well, he would have to get out of it in some way. But, whoever she was, her presence seemed to haunt him as he sat there. He could feel her arms around his neck and the pressure of her head against his shoulder and he felt an intense longing to again hold the little white-robed figure in his arms and feel her warm breath on his cheek. And he—dignified minister that he was—was gripped up the handkerchief and kissed it passionately.

He scarcely knew how he got through the next day. He was thankful that the services were such that he need not have to give a regular sermon. He studiously avoided looking at the choir, where Nellie Collier was sitting, until near the close of the evening services, when, while Elinor Vandever was singing a solo, he turned that way, and for a moment he saw her, her voice faltered for an instant and then rang out clear and sweet. He nearly let the hymnbook he was holding fall to the floor in his surprise, and a sudden feeling of relief came over him.

Elinor Vandever! He had never thought of her, and yet he knew that her pet name at home was Nellie. She had always been so reserved that he had never dreamed that she would care for him, but there was no mistaking that look.

"What a dear little thing she is. I don't think that I will want to give her up. I—I have been very fortunate," he said to himself as he met her at the foot of the stairs and drew her little hand on his arm. "Last evening you didn't!" He paused a moment.

"You—you were not angry?" she whispered anxiously. "You were busy talking to Nellie Collier, and Aunt Minnie was ready to go, and I didn't know how to get out of going along with her, but I don't think you would understand it."

"Well, if I didn't love you last week I have you to-night," he said tenderly, pressing the little hand to his side.—Chicago News.
