The Hatsuse was one of Japan's mightiest fighting machines. tration. In every respect she was more efficient vessel than the Petropavlovsk, the only Russian battleship totally destroyed, and the Russians who laid the mines that sent the Hatsuse to the bottom will feel that Admiral Makaroff and his brave men have been avenged. The loss of the protected cruiser Yoshino, as the result of a collison, is important only because of the drowning of over 200 of her crew. Japan has a large number of vessels of her class, and the loss of one matters very little in considering the problem of sea power. The loss of life in the Hatsuse diaster must have been about 450, as the Admiral reshow speakers and children very ports the rescue of 300 of the crew despite the appearance of a Russian torpedo flotilla after the explosion.

The question that the reader will naturally ask is, will the destruction of these two ships and 650 lives materially lessen Japan's command of the sea? At the moment, No. Ultimately the loss of a sixth of her battleship strength may prove a very grave and almost fatal one. Port Arthur is open for torpedo craft. The whole region round about seems to have been mined by one or other of the combatants. The destruction of the Hatsuse may give heart to the Russians and start them upon a series of daring attacks by torpedo on Japan's battleships and armored cruisers. The Japanese have still five battleships and Hugh Hay & Son are to the front eight atmored cruisers able to take the fleet could arrive in the China The young people of the Methodist seas and rescue the warships now church intend having a novel enter- shut up at Port Arthur and Vladitainment in the vestry on Monday vostok. Young ships might venture the hazardous ladies will act act as conductors and trip from Europe were they fairly certain that a port would be open to them at the end of it.

What follows from this? Clearly the absolute necessity for the capture by Japan of Port Arthur at the earliest possible moment and the destruction of the ships there, ships that added to the Baltic fleet would give Russia control of the sea and mightily endanger the position of the Japanese armies in Manchuria. Kuropatkin will not be overlooked, but Japan will hereafter strain every nerve to destroy the menace at Port A.

SAD DROWNING ACCIDENT.

On Sanday last in South Branch Lake, ten miles from Gaspereaux Station, C P R, two men lost their lives.
