AD ASTRA PER ASPERA.

BY MISS M. GILLIN.

There is little hope of success for the youth who starts out in life without the determination to overcome all hardships he may meet with, no matter how difficult they may be. Nothing great in art, science, literature or invention has ever been accomplished without it. A man may possess talent, even genius; he may be ever so brilliant and clever; he may be popular and entertaining; but, if he lacks this divine spark, this vitalizer of human energies, he will never achieve anything of importance or be a leader of men, for it is this patient, persistent telling that attains the goal.

If we trace back the life of a successful man to its beginnings, in the great majority of cases, we shall find that the boy began life with no special advantages over hundreds of others who failed. We shall find that he had about the same discouragements, the same difficulties and the same rebuffs that most men have. We almost always, however, find the same taproots of success—energy and persistence. Men may lack education, culture and refinement, yet they will succeed in what they undertake if they possess these qualities.

As we do not feel the sting of a nettle when we grasp it firmly, in like manner obstacles do not seem half so formidable after we have risen superior to them and determined to overcome them at all hazards.

Misfortune and difficulties make stronger those who have the courage to surmount them and use them as stepping-stones instead of stumbling blocks, so it is best to treat them as the oyster does the grain of sand which irritates it, that is, cover them with pearls and make them things of beauty; for after all what we call the obstacles of life are not in reality hindrances but opportunities, they are not set in our path to stop our progress but to call out our courage, to arouse our energy, and to inspire us to do our best. Therefore the youth who finds his environment a difficult one, instead of deciding that he has no chance of achieving anything, should make up his mind that he will turn his disadvantages to advantages and that he will make the obstacles in his path yield to him their strength instead of balking him in his course.

Circumstances discourage many people; they look about them and see no way of overcoming their difficulties and then yield without a real struggle. They see others whose conditions appear easier than theirs, who seem to have better opportunities, fewer obstacles, and more friends to help them, and the contrast makes their own condition appear more hopeless than ever; countless failures in life occur just at this point.

If we analyze a thousand examples of real success, taken at random, we shall find the same energy and persistence, like golden threads, running through all of them. We shall find that successful men and women are industrious; that they utilize every moment of their precious time. We shall find that they have been willing to deprive themselves of many of the so-called pleasures of the world and to confine themselves incessantly to their occupation. The secret of success, therefore, is not hard to find.

On looking over the lives of the world's most illustrious men it is a striking fact that the greater part of them began life in poor circumstances. Take for example, some of the greatest men of America who started life under the cloud of poverty and in positions which seemed to render their success impossible. Abraham Lincoln first saw the light in a log-cabin and had to undergo the hard life of a pioneer. He, however, had ambition, which would not be crushed by hardships, and would stop short of nothing but success. He advanced from one position of honor to another, until he reached that goal towards which his ambition wiled him.

William H. Vanderbilt is another example of how a boy raised himself from direct poverty to greatest riches, by his own efforts. He hauled wood for a living when a boy; but he had those qualities which would carry him to something better—pluck and energy. Beginning at the foot of the ladder, he advanced step by step until he reached the top. When he died he was the controller of millions.

Besides these instances many more might be cited to poor boys who became famous. Is not this a significant fact in itself? They had difficulties to overcome but they succeeded.

Over the door of a very old house in the West Bow of Edinburgh, Scotland, there is, or was, not many years ago, the significant inscription. "He that tholes, overcomes." What motive prompted the man who built the house to inscribe his dwelling thus,—whether the acquisition of the means for building it was the result of extraordinary persistence and endurance amid baffling discouragement,—is not known; but the maxim is one that must often have expressed itself on the minds of the passers-by. "He that tholes"—that is, he who endures without flinching,—"overcomes." He who, however harassed and buffeted, however sorely tried by "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," bears his trials patiently and with manly fortitude, triumphs at last.

The poet Wordsworth, who attained the highest eminence in his art, in spite of the sneers of critics, by patient toiling, gives, in his "Excursion" as a reason for continuing a mountain expedition when the sky began to look cloudy that, although a little rain might be disagreeable to the skin yet the act of giving up a fixed purpose, in view of a slight possible inconvenience, is dangerous to the character.

There are nations as well as individuals, that achieve success by toiling. England is a striking example. In the war of the giants waged by her against Napoleon, she wearied out and defeated her mighty foe by her stubborn pertinacity, rather than by any brilliancy in her military conceptions or operations. The Battle of Toulouse, where Soult made his last stand against Wellington, and the final decisive Battle of Waterloo, where Napoleon made his last stand against the Allies ending in his utter overthrow, were both proofs of the superiority of determination to impetuosity and dash, however brilliant.

Never give up, 'tis the secret of glory,
Nothing so wise can philosophy teach,
Look at the lives that are famous in story,
Never give up, is the lesson they preach.

More Spleen.

The King Street organ has a learned editorial this week which fully shows the venom held for Mr Carvell by all the outfit who abuse the King's English in the vain effort to discredit our popular member. These people, some of whom have not the manliness to come out into the open, are true Bourbons. They have never learned anything, and they never forget anything. Had they sense enough to see that their malicious and scurrilous attacks merely hurt themselves, they would soon desist. They never can get over the fact that the member for Carleton has been successful in smashing the various tory machines that for so long dominated both the town and county. A she-bear robbed of her whelps is not more savage than a tory removed from office. If these few misguided people would stick to the truth, there would be no complaint, but when, as in this week's Press, a whole cloth lie is served up, surely the public must be put on guard against these tissues of falsehood. Knowing the amount of personal enmity that rankles in the bosom of the Press outfit, the public will pay little attention to the ravings of the disappointed and disconsolate combination.

The Big Power Company.

There is joy in the hearts of the owners of the Meduxnakeag Dam. After many disappointments and accidents, the power was at last turned on Monday evening, and the fine new Armoury brilliantly illuminated. Within a few days the Small & Fisher lighting plant will be taken over. Many merchants and manufacturers have already agreed to take power in various amounts, from one or two horsepower to the quantity necessary to run a large plant. The work of wiring was ably done by Harry Baird. John Graham, an expert from outside, superintended the installation of the machinery, and put on the finishing touches. It is certain that the project will be highly successful, and the Company deserve credit for going on with the enterprise to the finish, in spite of the early discouragements.

Dr T F Sprague attended meeting of the Provincial Board of Health this week in St John and Fredericton.

Mrs W W Hay, Woodstock, is visiting friends in St John.
