SANTA CRUZ PAPER.

ENGLAND AND EGYPT

Since the Fashoda episode her control of Egypt has never more nearly involved Great Britain in war than during the recent frontier dispute with Turkey.

The white paper recently issued by the British Foreign Office contains the correspondence with the Porte, and makes it clear that the Turks were relying largely on the Pan-Islam agitators in Cairo for support. As far back as 1892 Turkey recognized that Tabah belonged to Egypt, but when, after certain "alarms" and "excursions" on the part of the Turkish troops in the Sinai Peninsula, a delimitation commission was suggested by the khedive, the Porte mistook this offer of the olive branch as a sign of weakness, and with characteristic audacity refused it. Fortunately, the Marquis of Lansdowne and Earl Cromer were in thorough accord. A small Egyptian force was sent to occupy Tabah, but, emulating Col. Marchand, a Turkish officer and troop were in possession. The triumph was not enduring.

The scene was changed to Constantinople, where the British ambassador made strong representations to the sultan. His majesty dexterously played his favorite waiting game in hopes that the anti-British press in Egypt would stir up discontent. But Lord Cromer, whose boldness has so often stood him in good stead, promptly obtained an increase in the British garrison in Egypt, and in February the British cruiser Diana proceeded to Farouk to prevent further aggression. It was at this point that war seemed imminent, for the Turkish forces on shore were prepared to resist a landing. Orders to land were not given, however, and the diplomatic duel in Constantinople continued until April. Then, encouraged by the calm manner in which Great Britain discussed the situation, the Porte went a step too far. The Turks at Rafeh, on the Mediterranean side of the disputed country, removed the Egyptian boundary marks, and when a British cruiser proceeded to the port the Farouk comedy was repeated, the Turks threatening to fire on any one landing from the vessel. The ultimatum so long necessary was issued on the 3rd of May, allowing the sultan ten days wherein to make up his mind either to fight Egypt and Great Britain or to evacuate Tabah and consent to a boundary commission on the basis of the 1892 agreement. Not until the 14th of May did the Porte yield, and only the tenacity of Britain's hold in Egypt and the obvious futility of any Moslem attempt at rebellion forced his hand.

Lord Cromer's closing dispatches show that, while the incident is closed, the causes that led up to it still exist. British occupation of Egypt is acknowledged by the world to have been for the good of its inhabitants. But while the fallahen may accord their blessing, there is always a section of the people representative of the ancient rule which is opposed to British methods and to Britain's unshakable determination to administer justice to all. Under the guise of patriotism or religion the British administration receives constant attacks from this irreconcilable minority, which of late years has received unquestioned support from Constantinople. The result is that, as Sir Edward Grey recently admitted in the imperial house of commons, Britain's rule in Egypt is less popular than people at home are inclined to suppose in view of the tasks which they have accomplished. Lord Cromer has been accused of favoring despotic measures, and his firmness in regard to the Denhawli executions has roused the ire of that small section of the house which is always ready to believe the worst of its own countrymen abroad. Yet it is clear that he does not desire to muzzle the Pan-Islamic press in Egypt, though he admits its baneful influence. His policy is to permanently increase the British garrison, the cost of which can well fall on the prosperous Egypt that he has created. Doubtless such a proposal will be opposed by his bitter critics at home, but he may with confidence rely on the support and approval of all patriotic British subjects.

There was a lively fracas on the Houlton road one evening last week. Two young ladies were walking along the street, when one of them suddenly stopped to pick up something. It was certainly a pretty piece of workmanship, and for the possession of the article there was keen strife, each lady claiming the prize. From loud talk the matter drifted on until it almost reached the hairpulling stage. Finally neighbors ran out, and quieted the belligerents, who retired from the field of battle. It afterwards leaked out that the object which caused all the trouble was a dainty visiting card, printed in one of the new type styles, at the SENTINEL Office.
