Meductic

Well here we are again with another story about things that happened years ago. None of the present generation know much of these events or how young folks enjoyed themselves in those days. There were no movies to go to or cars to ride around in, but what better way to spend an evening than to sail down the river on moonlight nights. How pleasant the mouth organ or accordion music was to the folks on shore — playing such songs as: "In the Evening by the Moonlight" and "My Love is Like a Little Bird". Some of the happenings had their humorous side too and there are not many that don't like a good laugh. You have read fish stories, and I know you have read bear stories and moose stories but this is a goose story. When my mother was a young girl about 16 years of age, she worked for Mrs. Jones at the Eel River Hotel, now Meductic. This hotel burned years ago on the spot where Earl Stairs' house now stands. Mother always helped Mrs. Jones do the pickling and preserving and naturally at that time everybody made their own wine, the wine in question, near as I can remember being cherry.

It was the custom at that time to have a flock of geese or turkeys and Mrs. Jones, running a hotel had lots of feed for the fowl. On the day of our story she had made four or five gallons of wine and after she had finished she threw the mash out in the back yard where the geese used to roam. Later going out in the yard she saw the geese stretched out — apparently dead.

"Come", she sez to the girls, "Let's get the feathers off them quick before Mr. Jones gets back." So Mrs. Jones, Mother and Sadie the other maid picked those birds, hid the feathers in the attic and threw the birds out in the bushes at the back of the house; for Mrs. Jones was one of the few women who was afraid of her husband.

Next morning when Mrs. Jones went out to the back door she blinked two or three times for she thought her eyes were playing tricks on her. There stood the geese, with no clothes on, asking for their breakfast.

You know the answer of course. The geese had eaten the mash and had gotten drunk on it. Well, how, this may seem a tall story to you but mother told it for the truth and in my time I heard of ducks in a pond getting drunk on home brew the police dumped there — yes, and I heard too of cows getting drunk from eating apples — but that business of picking the feathers off the poor birds is another matter.
