him and then. Their! Who where they, with their shrouded figures and their awful silent footsteps? And what was it they bore between them? "Clang!" He was powerless to move! On, on, they came, black in the moonlight, to where he stood, till on the stone at the elm-tree foot they rested their horrible burden. "Clang!" They were gone and he was alone with—oh, he knew too well what! And, as the last strokes of midnight rang out, he gave a piercing cry and fell senseless beside the awful thing.

"That's right, Mrs. Jones; he's coming round. Give him another drop of the punch;" and Jim opened his eyes, to find the big Squire bending over him, concern depicted in every line of his face.

Somebody put something on a spoon between Jim's lips and he coughed and swallowed and spluttered, and found voice enough to ask where he was.

He was on the Turkey carpet in front of a blazing fire in the big library at the Hall. Will Franks was standing blubbering by, and the motherly housekeeper was supporting his poor dazed head on her shoulder. There was a little crowd of people at the far end of the room, and a maid-servant in hysterics somewhere outside.

"The ghosts! The Squire!" he gasped. "Ghosts! Why, there are no such things, you know!" laughed the Squire, in his big voice. "Lift him up, and let him see for himself. That will do him most good. Look here! Here are the ghosts and the Squire too."

The crowd parted, disclosing in the centre a big, broad-shouldered, evil-faced man, with his head bound up, in the custody of Will Franks' father and a game-keeper, and a slight young lad cowering in the grasp of Mick.

"There's another ghost somewhere; but we shall send the police after him," said the Squire.

"Why, it's Heyshaw's father, the wheelwright! What has he done?" asked Jim, in amazement.

"That's what he'll have to explain to me presently. Here's the coffin."

Jim felt a queer sensation creep over him for a moment when he recognized the large square packing-case with a sack thrown over it in the corner.

"What's that?" he demanded still bewildered.

"What is it? Why, all the plate they could lay their hands on and a clean sweep of the drawing-room ornaments! Two more cases like that are in the pantry, and a horse and cart are waiting in Hangman's Walk as conveniently as you please. The villains! They knew that the butler was away on a holiday, and that we all go to bed early on Sundays. They didn't count on my being on the watch, and my friend here"—Micky's bow was Grandisonian—"dropping from the skies in the nick of time to shoot a few of them."

"Place your honor, it was only the horse that I terrified into the ditch as the blackguards were makin' off."

"Well, I'll not forget you," said the Squire, wiping his face; "and my young ghost-hunter here will be the hero of the place to-morrow."

"May I go home now?" asked the poor little man wearily. "And—and it wasn't a ghost, sir—but may I have my four shillings?"

"Go and get the dog-cart, some of you," spoke the Squire. "I'll take him home to his mother myself. Four shillings! Don't you remember what I promised the boy who buried the ghost? And you shall have it! For you've laid the worst ghost that'll ever be seen at Horsham Hall."

How Do You Walk.

A shoemaker says as soon as a man comes into my shop and takes off his shoes I can tell whether or not he is a good walker, and it is astonishing how few men know how to step out. If the shoe is worn down at the heel, not on the side, but straight back, and the leather of the sole shows weakness at the ball of the foot, a little greater on the inside just below the base of the great toe, I know that the wearer is a good walker. If, however, it is worn evenly throughout, and the sole is worn most near the toe, I know that I have to deal with a poor pedestrian. The reason of the difference in the position of the worn spots lies in the fact that the poor walker walks from his knee and the good one from the hip. Watch the passer-by on the street and you will at once see the difference. Nine out of ten men will bend the knee very considerably in walking, stepping straight out with both hips at the same line, and the toe will be the first that reaches the ground. The tenth man will bend the knee very little, just enough to clear the ground, and swing the leg from the hip, very much as the arm is swung from the shoulder, and not from the elbow. By so doing he calls upon the muscles which are stronger to bear the strain, and increases the length of his stride by four or six inches. The heel touches the ground first not the toe. A slight spring is given from the ball of the foot on making another stride. Men who walk in this fashion cover the ground 30 per cent. faster with the same extension as those who walk from the knee. In pugilism the old rule is to strike from the shoulder not from the elbow. In pedestrianism it is to walk from the hip not from the knee.
