was the least danger, the case of jewels was left on the table in the room, and George shut and locked the door, and gave the key to the clerk.

"Where is the book-room?" asked Archie. "I do not remember it."

"It is a sort of private sanctum, a little room opening out of his bed-room, where he keeps his account-books and private papers, and all sorts of odds and ends. We call it the book-room. No one can get into it without going through the bed-room first, as it has only one door, and when we left the bedroom, George locked that door behind us also."

"And the window?" asked Archie.

"That is only a very small casement, and has iron bars behind. Don't you remember how George has always grumbled about the small windows on the second floor, and what huge ventilators he had put above them all?"

"Yes, I remember saying he might as well put in fresh windows at once. But about the case of jewels when was it first missed?"

"Not till the first thing this morning. Then the clerk discovered that his key was gone. The book-room door was found unlocked. The case stood empty on the table and all the jewelry was gone."

"And the case left behind?" asked Archie, opening his eyes.

"Yes with nothing in it, not even a scrap of cotton wool!"

There was a moment's pause. Archie looked puzzled, his brows puckered up in deep thought.

"Was the safe opened or disturbed in any way?" he asked.

"Not in the least; and there was quite a large sum of money in it too; everything was exactly as it had been left on the night before."

"What was the jewel-case like?"
"It was a dark green morocco case, not unlike a small dressing case. Inside it had drawers and trays lined with cotton wool, and it fastened with an ordinary snap. George told the man that a case like that ought to be better secured; and he said the one they generally used had a patent lock, but it had been sent to Scotland with some jewelry, and he had been obliged to take this one. No; the mystery is not how the jewelry was taken from the box, but how any one contrived to get into the room through two locked doors."

Archie pondered deeply, with his eyes fixed intently on the head of his walking-stick.

"It is certainly very strange," he said. "But in what way are you connected with it? So far as I can see, you should be the last person to be suspected."

"Because I was the last person in the bed-room."

"But you say you all went out together, after locking both doors?" he argued.

"Yes, we did; but afterwards Ida asked me to fetch some particular kind of lace out of her wardrobe, and George gave me the key of the bed-room. I could not find the lace—in fact, it was not there, as Ida remembered afterwards; and I was quite a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes in looking for it, and the police seem to think I managed to take the jewelry during that time."

"What idiots!" ejaculated Archie. "Are the keys ordinary door keys?"

"The bed-room door-key is; but a few weeks ago George fancied his papers had been meddled with, so he had a fresh patent lock put on the book-room door. It was the key of that lock he gave to the clerk."

"Then how can the police imagine you opened the door?" asked Archie.

"I do not know; but that is not the strangest thing"—and Edith's face looked anxious again. "This morning, the first thing my maid saw on entering my room was a set of pearls lying scattered about on the dressing-table. They were Ida's?"

"Why, you must have taken them in your sleep?" said Archie suddenly.

Edith shook her head.

"I wish I could think so. How could I get through two locked doors in my sleep? George of course locked his bed-room door and the clerk had the key of the other. I have been worrying and puzzling over it all day," she went on with a slight shiver, "till at last I got so nervous and unhappy that I couldn't stay any longer in the house."

"You must not let it trouble you," he said, with a face full of sympathy. "It will all come out in a day or two. Are you sure you did not hear anything during the night?"

"I scarcely know," she answered hesitatingly. "Once, in the middle of the night, I woke up with a start and a dreadful sense of being watched by something I could not see. But I have often had the same feeling before, when it has been only imagination; so I do not know whether I was dreaming or not; and I dare not have got up to see on any consideration."

"What an arrant coward!" said Archie with a laughing glance. "I suppose George and your sister do not believe this absurd suspicion of you?"

"No, they are very kind. They laugh at the bare idea of it. It is the police. There are three or four of them in the house, and I know they have watched me all day. It is horrible. The servants too are whispering and prying about in the corners; and I cannot help fancying it is about me. I am glad you are come, Mr.

Lorrimer; you will be sure to find it all out."

"I must have a long talk with the Major about it," he said, as they rose to go. "It certainly is a most uncomfortable and mysterious affair."

CHAPTER II.

Almost at the same time that Edith was enlightening Archie Lorrimer on the subject of the robbery, the quiet gentlemanly stranger who had travelled with Archie from Normanton Junction was having an interview with Major Forwood on the same subject. And the interview meant business, for the quiet, uncommunicative man was a skilled detective from Scotland Yard, who had been telegraphed for in all haste to fathom the mystery of the robbery at Forwood Chase.

He listened with quiet attention to Major Forwood's account, asking a searching question or two occasionally, but offering no opinion or remark.

"It is the most painful thing possible," said the Major, when he had finished his tale. "Added to the annoyance and loss of the actual robbery, those stupid police have pitched their suspicions upon the least likely person in the world to have been the thief."

"You mean the young lady?" interrupted the detective, whose name was Hilton.

"Is she on a visit here?"

"She lives here; she is my wife's sister, the daughter of the former Rector of Forwood."

"Is she well off?"

"No," said the Major shortly, not liking the cross-questioning.

"Enough to live upon?" persisted Mr. Hilton, raising his eyebrows a little.

"Yes," returned the Major, not choosing to confess how little that "enough" was.

"Is she fond of jewelry?"

"Yes, of course. Did you ever see a woman who was not?"

The detective smiled an inscrutable ghost of a smile which told nothing.

"Believe me, Miss Tresham is above suspicion," said the Major, getting vexed.

"Besides, she could have no motive for stealing the jewelry."

"The most curious cases I know have been done without apparent motive," was the detective's comment in a thoughtful tone; "and she might be in want of money."

"I am as sure of her as I am of myself," declared the Major.

"Nevertheless we are often mistaken in our estimate of others," said Mr. Hilton persistently. "Pardon me the remark, 'Truth is stranger than fiction'; and it is a detective's duty to search for the truth among the greatest improbabilities."

And then there was a few minutes' silence.

"Have any of your servants left lately?" was the next question.

"They are all old servants, except my wife's maid. None have been here less than four years; and they are to be trusted. Besides, not one of them knew of the jewelry being in the house, which quite does away with any suspicion in that quarter."

"And so," commented the officer significantly, "narrows the circle, and makes it all the easier for us to find the thief."

And again there was silence, the Major chafing inwardly at the quiet deliberation of the detective.

"Will you allow me to recapitulate the heads of the case?" said the latter presently. "You will correct me if I make a mistake!"

"Certainly," said the Major, somewhat haughtily.

"Briefly stated, then, the case is this," began Mr. Hilton, in his quiet, grave way.

"In the presence of four persons the jewels are packed in a case, taken up-stairs, and placed on a table in an inner room, to which no access can be gained except through an outer one. The key of the safe being lost, the box is left on the table, apparently exactly the same as before; the door is then locked, and the key given to the clerk. The bed-room door is also locked, and, excepting when Miss Tresham goes in, continues so during the night. In the morning the jewels are gone, but the case itself is intact. A portion of the missing jewelry is found strewn about Miss Tresham's room. Is that correct?"

"Perfectly—though, for that matter, my bed-room door was bolted as well as locked after I went to bed," answered the Major, keeping his temper with difficulty. "The cool statement of facts, and the inferences the detective seemed to be drawing from them, rendering him almost furious with indignation."

"To reach the jewels," went on Mr. Hilton, "the thief required two keys—one in possession of a person in quite a different part of the house, the other on the inside of the door of a room in which two people are sleeping. Are the keys ordinary door-keys like the rest of the house?"

"The bed-room door-key is; but I had a new lock put on the other one about a fortnight ago—the old one was worn out. I keep private papers in the book-room and wish to have them safe."

"I should like to see the rooms," said the officer after a pause.
