An Enjoyable Event.
The elite of Camp-kettle Canon gave a ball in honor of the departure of our summer tourists. I received an invitation, and attiring myself in my holiday raiment, I bent my fantastic steps toward the pavilion, where the light shone o'er fair women and a sturdy lot of men. As I threaded my way through the enclosure of people to pay my compliments to mine host, who was at the extreme end of the pavilion serving refreshments to the guests, I was jostled hither by the ever-restless cowboy, who was dressed in a new hat, and kicked on the shins by a sturdy miner, who, with his orange colored boots and flaming red shirt, was eagerly striving for the same goal as myself.
Reaching the bar I stood entranced. Such an array of beauty I had never before seen in the Canon. Gloriously colored bottles and beautiful women, and the glasses were a third longer than any I had ever seen used in this camp.
The ladies were dressed in glorious plumes, and the glasses were the same color as the liquor. You could fill them as full as you pleased and no one would be the wiser as to the size of the drink you took, unless you ran them over, which was no uncommon occurrence.
I had only time to pay the required compliments, and get my change, when bang went the music, with roll and a thud that made Rome howl.
A dizzy belle from Dead Man's Gulch made a dash and got a rolling hitch on me and away we went into a howling maze. She sang out for me to relax my clutch on her, and just then something struck the butt of my ear, and some one said, "If you want to dance with my girl, all right; but no hugging." I learned afterwards that they were dancing the Fireman's Dance instead of a waltz.
As soon as I got righted up I asked a belle from Crazy Horse if she could trip the light fantastic. She said she could kick as many splinters off a pine slab as any girl this side of the divide. We took our places at the head of a set, and when the fiddler-in-chief yelled, "Gents to the right, and ladies to the left," she stamped into the middle of the room, and the way she jumped onto the planks made the dancers stare in silent amazement. I gave a lurid yell and rushed into the thickest of the fray. Seizing her hand, I vigorously took part in the giddy dance. The rest acted as spectators while we tripped the Irish tra-la-lu.
A great slabsided cowboy slipped in behind, and knocked me through the side of the pavilion, and before I could find the main entrance and get back to my place, the set had left the floor, and a half-breed was buying refreshments for my partner.
I next addressed a beautiful blonde from Cat Liver Gorge.
When I asked her to dance she said she came with her future brother-in-law, who objected to his brother's wife dancing with any one outside the family. I told her I was thinking some of marrying her future husband's aunt's cousin, but she said I would have to produce my credentials to get a seat in that convention.
I introduced one of the young tourists to a square-built Amazon from Rattlesnake Hill.
He asked her to favor him with her hand in a quadrille that was just forming. She accepted and when the word came "Partners all," she caught him around the small of the back gave him a sample of the high altitude swing, and when she dropped him he rolled out one of the side entrances, from which he ran to the hotel to rest, and pack his grip.
I engaged a charming Daigo for a round dance, and as we went whirling in and out, alternating bumps between the dancer and the side of the pavilion, my arm resting lightly around her taper waist, while I gazed into her azure eyes, my soul arose some distance into the ethereal.
Stopping before the refreshment counter I asked her what she would have.
"Whisky sour," she replied.
Then I knew that she was on earth, earthly.
The hum of conversation became more distinct every instant, and an occasional bullet hummed overhead and crashed through a lamp, until a semi-twilight prevailed in the pavilion.
I had engaged in conversation with a brunette of some fifty summers, who runs a stock ranch over on Lone Steer, and while we were discussing the political outlook, a greaser and a cowboy opened up a shooting gallery. The other cowboys took a hand, and some more greasers and half-breeds joined the other side. I asked her if it would be agreeable to her if we should walk up town for some oysters. She said it would, and being in something of a hurry, I made an aperture in the side of the pavilion, preferring a short cut to going out the main entrance.
We were but a short time going up town, but I found about all the dancers there ahead of me, and what was peculiar about it, the most of them came through the side of the pavilion the same as we did.
There were so many different places of exit made in the sides that it weakened the roof support, and it fell in. A lamp burst and the whole structure was burned to ashes.
After taking an invoice, it was found that only three greasers and a Chinaman were missing. The guests then all de-

Wants Peace.

LONDON, Sept. 26.—The Standard's Vienna correspondent records a discussion which was carried on at the table of the Archduke Albrecht during the Austrian military manoeuvres as to whether it would be wise to allow a known enemy to complete preparations for war or whether it was not preferable to force a conflict. "No names were mentioned," says the correspondent, "but all understood that Russia was meant."

Emperor William said emphatically: "I strongly believe that the enormous responsibility which modern warfare imposes must override all military theories. I would not begin war if conscious that by delaying it I could secure a single year, nay, a single month, of peace by trusting in the success of my good cause. Even if the chances are equal on both sides, there is much to be gained by having several months of peace." The king of Saxony expressed himself to the same effect, pointing out instances where diplomacy had averted an apparently inevitable conflict.
Archduke Albrecht also dilated upon the enormous responsibility of forcing a war, in view of the murderous perfection of modern weapons.

The correspondent says Emperor William's remarks made a deep impression on the high rank German and Austrian officers present.

A letter upon the Younghusband incident is published here from Arminius Vambery, the distinguished Oriental traveller and writer, who in 1861-64 travelled in the disguise of a derelict by routes unknown to Europeans through the deserts of the Oxus to Khiva and thence by Bokhara to Samarcand. Professor Vambery is professor of Oriental languages at the University of Pesth and he has for years past written letter after letter to the Times and other newspapers warning the British Government and the people of England against the designs of Russia in regard to India.

An American's Complaint.

The superiority of American travelling accommodations is amusingly illustrated by the wail of a New York gentleman, who relates the following incident in a pathetic letter to a London morning paper. He was travelling from London to Scotland alone, in a first-class carriage. At least he remained in solitude for the first six hours of his journey and then the door of his compartment was opened, and, to his horror, a well dressed woman entered accompanied by a nursemaid carrying a baby.

They arranged their baggage so as to make a couch for the youngster to recline upon, and then, without the slightest apology to the American, proceeded to make baby's toilet. Out of a portly bag came a small india rubber bath, and a leather skin filled with water. Baby was undressed, washed, powder puffed, dried, kissed, fed, put into night attire, soothed out of a squalling fit, spanked, then kissed and fed again; during which time the wretched New Yorker went into retreat behind a large copy of a Birmingham newspaper. He concludes his letter with the remark, "I am a single man, I am a nervous man, I am a bashful man, and every sense in me, nay, every fiber of me, has been mortified and outraged by a spectacle that I regard as a disgrace to the British railroad system and to civilization generally."
