TWELVE LADY JURORS.
The Experiment Not a Howling Success if This Story is true.

"I was purser on one of the German Lloyd steamers about ten years ago," says a writer in the Nashville Herald, "and we had been making a smooth journey of it on one summer trip. It was just after the school commencement season and three-fourths of the passengers were ladies. There was a young fellow, aboard from Georgia, I believe, who was travelling alone, and who appeared to have a very cool supply of cash when he started out. He soon became the victim, however, of one of those unprincipled scoundrels I ever saw, a desperate blackleg, who made his living crossing and recrossing the ocean and fleecing the passengers at cards. He was a Spanish-Mexican and a devilish handsome fellow. I saw him afterwards in Seville, where he had a wife living—as pretty a woman as a man ever laid eyes on.

"Well, gentlemen and ladies, this young Georgian was fresh meat for the scoundrel. They went at their cards early and late. It was a pity to see him. The Spaniard knew he had him, and was playing him like a cat does a mouse. "Little by little that young man's money was crossing the green, and the game was worked so nicely that he thought every loss would be his last. He was so sure luck would change that he got wild about it. He was pale and sick from excitement.

"One day the Sevillian got reckless in his cups and bungled, I guess, for all at once the young Southerner was at his throat and said he cheated. "I never saw such a desperate look as that Spaniard turned on us when several officers rushed up. He looked like an animal who had been wounded and whose first instinct was to strike back again. He was scared and self-assured at the same time. His face was red his eyes were dancing from his assailant to the spectators and back again, and the very minute we were pitying his fright he had whipped out a stiletto from his sash and buried it in the young fellow's bowels.

"It was the work of a second, and the next he was struggling in the grasp of a dozen men, who had a rope around his neck and were hurrying him to the side of the ship. "It was here the women came in. The murder occurred at an hour when the deck was thronged with passengers, and the situation was understood in a flash. "There were screams and cries for pity and loud appeals for us to stay our hands. There were delicate white hands clinging to our coats, and before anything could be done the whole aspect of the affair had changed so that no gentleman on his honor could have followed out the plainest duty of the moment.

"For some motives of policy the captain took no active part in what followed. The fate of the murderer was turned over to the hands of the passengers, and our good will to the blackleg was so generally questioned that the ladies insisted in taking a hand in the trial. "A jury of 12 ladies—schoolteachers, school girls and professional excursionists—was impanelled with small regard to opinions that were previously formed or expressed. "A lawyer from some Western State volunteered to defend the prisoner, and I have had very little respect for that man since, although his name is a household word to-day and he has figured prominently in politics.

"There was considerable formality about the trial. The examination of witnesses was close, and the course pursued by the prosecution was vigorous and aggressive. The scoundrel's character was freely ventilated and shown to be of the very blackest sort.

"The details of the crime and the devilish system of robbery which led up to it were freely emphasized. "In the meantime that villain sat and wept. Tears stood in his handsome dark eyes, and his cheeks were pale with every token of remorse. His long waving black hair was matted on his forehead, and he was the picture of despair. "He had already been exalted from the lyncher's rope to the seat of a murderer on trial, and damn me, sirs—begging your pardon miss—before they got through with the argument that Westerner made him an archangel.

"Every member of the whole blessed jury were crying. They would say, 'Poor, dear fellow!' and when the blamed lawyer stooped lower than I ever saw a gentleman stoop, and asked for pity and mercy upon the devil whose life had doubtless been under bad influences, and who would have been a Sunday-school superintendent if it had not been for misleading companionship, there was one grand burst of sympathy.

"Public sentiment of which that jury was the centre, became so strong in favor of the gambler that the young Georgian was made out to be criminal for crossing the path of this ill-starred but well-meaning imp of satan, and tempted him to do wrong. "The foreman of the jury took her lace handkerchief from her bosom as he sat blubbering with the rest of them. A pretty blue-eyed, yellow haired girl was at the head of the row, and she rose from her seat and dampened the handkerchief before she offered it to him.

"The gentleman passengers realized that the trial was absolutely farcial, and gave up trying to bring the murderer to the swift justice which those on board ship felt their right to mete out. "The jury was finally allowed to retire and an immediate verdict of not guilty was expected. They were very earnest about it, although the rest of us had got to thinking of it as a joke. We wanted to hear the result of their consultation. Twenty minutes slipped away. Then it lengthened into an hour. The judge got down off his bench and the court was resolved into a group of curious passengers, who expressed to each other at intervals the deepest interest in the secret deliberations of the 12 women in the cabin below.

"Sunset, and the bells for dinner, but still no jury. Finally they fled up the steps and gathered at the point where the judge met them. They were immediately surrounded by every passenger aboard, and ears were strained to catch every word that fell from the forewoman's lips.

"Have you agreed?" asked the judge. "No, sir," she replied. "How is the jury divided?" "I don't know, your excellency."

"Is there any point of law you wish explained in order to aid your decision?" "No sir, we understand the law." "Why do you not come to a verdict? Would you like to postpone decision until to-morrow?"

"No, sir," said the forewoman, suddenly gaining firmness, "I will have nothing more to do with the jury, not another instant. I would not again resume the responsible position I now hold, sir, for any consideration. The poor man has been maligned and abused by the members of this jury until my ears revolt at the sound of their voices. Everything went off smoothly enough at first until one lady, who was admiring the fine Spanish face of the accused, was interrupted by the most ignoble insinuation that he was a Mexican."

"Judge!" cried the blue-eyed girl, springing to her feet, "I demand the right to speak. I meant no malice to the prisoner by saying he was a Mexican. I believe there are as good men in Mexico as there ever was in Spain, and it is traitorous to our country to speak otherwise."

"Whoever heard of such rank heresy?" said a Boston excursionist turning in her chair and appealing to the crowd. Has Mexico ever produced a Ferdinand, a Philip V., an Isabelle?"

"Then the whole jury opened up. Each woman on it was a volcano loaded to the neck for or against Mexico, and she took her crowd of listeners and harranged them vociferously. The passengers became involved in the debate. A splendid full-chested jury lady collared the judge and talked Prescott to him by the mile.

"The Mexican war was kept up for three days. The court never was convened again, nor was sentence passed. The blackleg was kept under guard, but he was the lion of the ship. Every effort was put forth to make him enjoy himself, and so jealously did the ladies protect him that while we were landing there was a grand final dispute about putting him in irons. The boat touched the pier while the discussion was still high, and in the midst of it the prisoner escaped."

 We desire to call attention to the laws in force regarding the receiving of newspapers:

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary are considered wishing to continue their subscriptions.
2. If subscribers order a discontinuance of their periodicals, the publishers may continue to send them until arrearages are paid.
3. If subscribers neglect to take the periodicals from the office to which they are directed, they are responsible till they have settled up their bill and ordered them discontinued.
4. If subscribers move to other places without informing the publisher, and the papers are sent to their former direction, they are held responsible.
5. The courts have decided that refusing to take the periodicals from the office or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud.

Egypt will become English if the teaching of our language in its schools can bring that change about. The complete reversal of positions which the French have had to suffer since 1889 causes them much bitterness of feeling. In the government schools in Egypt 2,500 pupils were taught French in 1889, whereas now nearly 3,000 are taught English. The spread of English in Egypt is greatly facilitated by the feeling among all capable native Egyptians that it is the commercial language of the future.
