PARNELL.

The civilized world was startled one day last week by the intelligence that Charles Stewart Parnell lay dead at Brighton, England. On learning the news, the first thought of many was that the eminent home ruler had committed suicide. Probably the suspicion grew out of the facts that Parnell had not been previously reported to be seriously ill, and that two other noted politicians or revolutionists, Boulanger and Balmaceda, had completed their failures by a voluntary death. The suspicion, however, was soon shown to be unfounded. It was proven that Parnell's death had been preceded by serious illness of several days duration, and was the natural result of heart trouble complicated with congestion of the lungs. Scarcely anybody seemed prepared for such a sudden and early ending of a career so remarkable. Amid the feelings awakened by the event, the chief work of Parnell's life was recalled, and admirable features in his character were largely dwelt on. The tone of remark concerning him was in the main generous and kindly. Those who had taken sides with him in his struggle for continued leadership, of course, expressed themselves strongly in his behalf. Some who took part in his deposition from his place of pride spoke regretfully of his failures and errors, and admiringly of his better qualities and great deeds; and many of those opposed from the beginning to his aims have dealt with his character and memory fairly.

Discussion however has been busiest in estimating the effect of his death on the fate of parties and the progress of the home rule measure. The general conclusion at first appeared to be that the death would inure greatly to the advantage of the Gladstone party, and would hasten the achievements of the home rule objects. Some of the chief leaders of the anti-Parnellite party spoke out on the occasion, showing that they would only be too willing to join hands with their old comrades in arms. But up to the moment of writing, none of Parnell's latest supporters have reciprocated, while some of the most noted and influential among them have spoken of their opposition in the bitterest terms, charging them with the murder of their leader. It does not yet appear how largely or how long this feeling will prevail among Parnellites.

Unionist writers and speakers fancy that the feeling will be largely perpetuated, and that consequent on the removal of Parnell, divisions will break out in the ranks of the Parnellites which will have a paralyzing effect on their movements, and they are strong in the assertion that the home rule project will gain nothing by Parnell's death.

It is too early to fix Parnell's status in history. At present he is both under and overrated. That he had some of the chief qualifications for leadership cannot be successfully denied. But there are those who rank him higher than Grattan or O'Connell. Doubtless he had some great qualities in which both of these famous men were deficient. But as an orator he cannot be named in the same day with either of those celebrated men. Grattan was one of the most brilliant speakers that ever lived. O'Connell was, perhaps, the most powerful stump orator that ever moved a mighty mass of men.

SMITH.

The death of W. H. Smith, leader of the British House of Commons, a few days ago, created something of a sensation. It was unexpected; for though he had suffered in a lengthened illness, it was understood that his restoration to health was going on steadily.

In the situation, the loss to his party was large. He filled a highly important position, and he possessed qualities of a highly valuable character. True, he was not a great orator, nor a peculiarly powerful debater. But he had a strong, clear head, a kind heart and first rate business aptitudes. His judgment was respected, and he had hosts of friends and no enemies. He was a child of the people, a self-made man, who had amassed a fortune in a cleverly conducted business, and he filled an honored place in a cabinet in which sat men with the bluest blood of the empire in their veins. He succeeded more than fairly well in a difficult position in which some able men had failed. For the one session yet remaining to be occupied by the British House of Commons, no serious difficulty can be found in providing a successor to Mr Smith in its leadership.

ership. Balfour and Goschen are both mentioned in that connection. They are both very able men.

THE COMMISSION.

The judicial commission appointed to investigate the hundred thousand dollars steal in Quebec has got to work, and for some weeks to come its daily proceedings will be eagerly and widely watched. It is to be hoped the search will be thorough and satisfactory and that the finding will be just according to the evidence. Yesterday the judges were to decide whether or no they would allow a triplet of lawyers to act as prosecutors in behalf of the Quebec people in the case before them.

DORCHESTER, October 7th, 1891.

DEAR EDITOR:—I have addressed to every post office in the two counties of Westmorland and Kent, to be posted for public inspection, copies of preliminary lists, including lists of names to be added and to be removed, together with notices as to the time of holding courts of revision, and as to the time within which to give notice for the adding or striking off of names.

I take the liberty of inviting, through your columns, every one entitled to a vote to see that his name is on, and, if not on, to apply at once by a notice in form D., and a solemn declaration of the possession of the qualifications necessary to entitle to be registered. Let there be no delay. Forms can be had at all printing offices. Many names have been struck off which I believe can be restored by an application. My desire is to make as perfect a list as possible, and for that purpose the aid of all parties interested is invited.

Yours very truly,
 P. A. LANDRY,
 Revising Officer.

A Remarkable Ferryboat.

One of the most extraordinary boats on the American lakes is a passenger car transfer ferryboat operated in the straits of Mackinac by the Duluth, South Shore, and Atlantic Railroad. It has an enormous capacity for carrying cars, but its peculiarities are its strength, its shape, and the number of its steam engines. It carries twenty-four steam engines for the performance of the various requirements of its daily business. The hull of the boat is as solid as the walls of an old time block house. The bow rises from the water so as to hang or slant over it as if it were a hammer—and that is what it was built to be. The boat is an ice breaker, intended to keep a channel open in the straits during the winter, or to make one whenever it is pushed into the massive ice that forms in that cold region. The big boat advances towards the ice and, shoving her nose upon its edge, lifts herself up on it. Then a screw propeller under the overhanging bow performs its work of sucking the water from under the ice to enable the boat's weight to crush it down the more easily. Thus the destructive monster makes her way steadily through the worst ice of the semi-polar winters of that region, climbing up on the ice, crushing it down, and making no more of it than if it were so much slush.—Iron Age.
