I was determined to be so far clear as this-that if anything ever did come to light it should be proved that I had no share of the spoil-that directly I found out the truth I left the woman undisputed mistress of her fortune and continued to earn my own living.

I saw my wife once after that. She wrote me to meet her in London. I kept the appointment, and she proposed a com-References-New York College of Denpact. I didn't take to it all at once. I began, as many men do when trouble and sorrow come upon them, to hate being alone at night, and so, when the day's work was done, instead of going home I loafed about the streets, and went into bar parlors and P.O.Box 399. It was the letter which I had the people who kept the house where I lodged. Then I began to feel the bitter-I taxed my wife with the deception she ness of my position. My love was returned. Then I did another mad wicked thing. I never intended to go back to England again. My wife and I were separated for ever-dead to each other. She "Nonsense," she said, "you committed had taken her maiden name again, and so I married-married my sweet little Cora and lived with her as happy as the conscience I could not entirely stifle would

It is difficult for a man who has not been placed in my position to understand how I could bring myself to act as I did.

To understand it you must take into consideration all the circumstances and remember that I never had any love for the woman who had marred my life by making me her dupe. I had never known one moment of the happiness of married life with her, and I rebelled against the idea of growing old robbed by her trickery of the solace of a loving woman's companion-

My position was a desperate one. The step I took to remedy it was a desperate one. But I persuaded myself that I was another man, that the husband of Marion that the husband of Cora Williamson had nothing in common with him. And, persuading myself thus, I refused any longer to be miserable and determined to make the best of my life and let my terrible secret die if need be with me.

After my marriage I settled down and my good star seemed to be in the ascendlent me I went into business, speculated and prospered, and at the end of another

We had a sweet little home and I was supremely happy. Cora was a devoted wife, and from the first hour of our marriage we never had an angry word.

Sometimes in the silence of the night I would wake up and think of the other woman and the other life. But I never I quite agreed with her that hencefor- let the thought linger. I drove it away, mare-a something which was only the creation of my imagination.

The good luck which had set in after my marriage with Cora continued, and at last a big successful coup made me the possessor of what without exaggeration might be called a fortune. At any rate I was placed beyond the necessity of work and had leisure to enjoy life and to devote myself to my wife's society and my own amusement.

Then there came upon me an intense longing to go over to England for a while -to see the old country once again. My wife was very anxious to go. It had been the dream of her life to see Europe.

Where was the danger? I was only Mr William Smith. Mr. and Mrs. Smith could stay at any hotel without attracting attention to their names, and the other woman was hardly likely to meet us or even to know of Cora's existence. We were separated. She was Miss Ellis, a spinster, and if the worst came to the worst she couldn't betray me without the story of why I left her coming out, and that might be awkward for the £30,-

She would have to account for her taking her maiden name. She would have to inflict such an injury upon me by tak. ing proceedings that she would be sure I should not spare her in return.

She had told me at the time we separated that all she wanted was to be left free. Was she likely, even if by a remote chance she learned of my marriage, to sacrifice her freedom and proclaim herself my

She had never loved me, there could be no jealousy. She had everything to gain by holding her tongue, everything to lose by making me her enemy. Again my fatal habit of arranging matters to suit my own views came into play. I convinced myself that there was no earthly chance of Marion crossing my path or assuming a hostile attitude.

London we went to the Langham Hotel. I showed my wife all the sights in the great city and she was delighted.

One day I thought I would like to show her my mother's grave, so I took her to Highgate, where we had buried my mother beside my father in the family grave he had purchased years before the crash

I had some difficulty in finding the tomb, so I left my wife on the gravel path while I went wandering about.
