COUNT RAOUSSET DE BOULBON, OF FRANCE.

How He Conquered the Apaches in Mexico—His Real Mission Never Disclosed.

San Francisco Chronicle: There is a chapter in the history of the Pacific Slope that has been well nigh forgotten in the long list of stirring events that make the story of the country one of the most remarkable in the world. This chapter, however, deserves to be remembered if only as a proof of what one man's valor can accomplish.

In the early days of the gold excitement in California, among the thousands of adventurers that came flocking to the El Dorado from all over the world, was a young Frenchman calling himself Count Raousset de Boulbon. He was handsome, noble in bearing, gay and gallant, with manners that won him friends by the dozen, and no one doubted his right to the title he claimed. He frankly admitted his poverty and that he had come to the new country to seek his fortune. "Would he leave la belle France for any other reason?" he would ask with a shrug of his shoulders.

To his confidants he told a story of a fair little cousin in his beloved Paris who was to be his when he should have made his fortune. But whose prudent papa would not give her up without. But his struggles to win this fortune, though many and earnest were not crowned by success. He worked in the mines, but though he toiled with a patient and never-tiring hand he made barely a living. He even turned his versatile mind to the preparation of French dishes for the refectory of the miners, but the delicious little entrees and appetizing soups that he served in the paper cap and white apron of the professional cuisiniere were poorly paid for, and he never made enough to start the café that alas and alas for fallen grandeur had become the height of his ambition.

But his failure was more the result of his generous nature than from any inability to make it. Raousset Boulbon was everybody's friend. No poor wretch ever applied to him in vain. When a homesick "Hoosier," with tears in his eyes begged him for the $10 he lacked of having enough to "git back to Injanny with" the count drew forth the last of his little hoard, and gave it to him, saying: "When you are at home once more, pray you for another poor exile, who will never see his native land again."

In the summer of 1852 things had reached a desperate pass with the gay Gascon, and it is to be feared that he had an intimate acquaintance with hunger and cold, but he made no complaint. A hundred purses would have been open to him, but he kept his needs from his friends as jealously as if it had been a disgrace. A Kentucky gambler named Taylor had taken a great fancy to the brave and genial Frenchman, and often would urge him to borrow of his plenty, but Raousset Boulbon would shake his head and refuse the loan, because, as he said, he saw no prospect of repaying it. But one day his fortune came to him in the shape of an idea. He sought Taylor and told him at last that he would ask him for help. "Let me have $200 and my fortune is made. I will repay you before the year is out." Taylor handed him the amount without a question as to what he meant to do with it, but with a hearty assurance that he was welcome to its use as long as he chose.

The next day the count left San Francisco on a good serviceable horse and armed with a rifle, knife and revolver he rode to the south, but further than this no one knew where he went, and he was soon forgotten.

Raousset, after many perilous adventures, made his way to the City of Mexico, where he laid his carefully thought out plans before the government. He had noticed, he said, that the Indians of Sonora had rendered life so unsafe that the country would be abandoned ultimately. It had become almost a wilderness, though a very productive state, and in a few years would cease to be inhabitable for the Indians destroyed every growing crop and herd of cattle on which they could lay their hands. The count believed himself able to correct this state of affairs by punishing every depredation, and engaged to do so for the small sum of 200,000 francs, or $40,000, and the arms and horses for his men.

The Mexican government at its wits' end about the matter, and impressed by Raousset Boulbon's manner, which was confident while modest, agreed to give him the money he asked for together with 10,000 men and the arms for them. The men the count refused. He had already made his plan of action, and understanding his own countrymen better than any other soldiers he could obtain, he proceeded to engage only Frenchmen in his enterprise.

He returned to San Francisco and there won over enough of his compatriots to his cause to take the field. He entered Sonora and after a careful study of the topography of the country, he began his campaign. He divided the state into parallel running east and west, and drove them from one to another of them, until in sheer desperation the Redskins left the country, fleeing to the mountains and hiding panic-stricken in their fastness. He gave no quarter. Everything, man, woman and child, was killed when he struck an Indian camp. Not one lived to tell the tale. And what terrorized the red skins most was the suddenness of his attacks. They never knew the hour when he would come sweeping down upon them. One day he would be here in one part of the state, to be found massacring a band of Indians in another the next.

The owners of the haciendas and settlers hailed him as a saviour and encouraged him with large gifts of money and horses. He became a little king in the country, but the Mexican government grew jealous of his ever-increasing popularity and sent a frigate to blockade the port from which he drew his supplies. The Sonorans secretly encouraging and aiding him, the count captured the frigate. When thoroughly alarmed the government sent General Blanco against him with a regiment of soldiers. Blanco surrounded the count's troops, and to prevent his men being killed in such an unequal battle Raousset Boulbon surrendered himself on condition that his company be allowed to disperse in peace. This was granted and the count was taken to the City of Mexico to be tried for treason, but alarmed at the muttering of the people of Sonora, it was finally settled to compromise the matter with the Frenchman and to pay him a sum that has been variously estimated at from $300,000 to $1,000,000 to quit the country.

The count consented, and with this sum returned to San Francisco to look for his old friend, Taylor. Although the big-hearted gambler did not wish to receive back the money he had lent the count, the latter forced it upon him and would have added a generous interest, but Taylor utterly refused to have it. He told the count, however, that he would claim one favor from him. "Anything, anything, mon ami," said the grateful Gascon, "even to my life." "Oh not that," laughed the Kentuckian, "I only want the right to look after you till you take ship for France." "How you mean look after me?" the count inquired. "Why I mean that if I or some real friend does not take care of you that you would give away every cent of your money to beggars and 'beats' before you can get away to France with it." Raousset Boulbon laughed, knowing his own weakness. So Taylor guarded him until he went aboard the ship that was to take him to his beloved home and the little cousin.

But alas, for love and romance, there were many doubting Thomases who did not believe in the existence of that little cousin and in the charming romance the count had woven with her as heroine. These declared that Raousset Boulbon's mission was a political one, and that he was sent to California by the French government, which had grown jealous of the American aggression in the direction of Sonora, and which aimed at colonizing the country itself, and so press on the rest of Mexico and even on Central America. Among others who so mistrusted the count was Senator Bell of Tennessee. This statesman presented this view of the case to his colleagues of the house and supported his arguments by the fact that Raousset associated only Frenchmen with him in his daring enterprise. But whether simple adventurer as he proclaimed himself to be, or tool of the French government, his name to this day is among the Indians as a synonym for that of daring and remorselessness.

What became of the count after he left America was never known. He sent no message back, and his very memory is well nigh gone in San Francisco.

Ball players and athletes need Johnson's Anodyne Liniment for bruises, lameness and cuts.

Buckingham's Dye for the Whiskers can be applied when at home, and is uniformly successful in coloring brown or black, hence its great popularity.

The merit of Hood's Sarsaparilla is not accidental but is the result of careful study and experiment by educated pharmacists.

A gentleman, under forty years, whose hair was rapidly becoming thin and gray, began the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor, and in six months his hair was restored to its natural color, and even more than its former growth and richness.

MYRTLE NAVY.—The success which the Myrtle Navy tobacco has with the public is because it is composed of the very finest Virginia leaf grown, and is manufactured with the most scrupulous care at every stage of process.

Those who have lost all faith in the "weather forecasts" are recommended to try a very simple experiment with a cup of coffee and a cup or two of loaf sugar. Having dropped the lumps of sugar in the cup of coffee carefully, watch the air bubbles rise to the surface. If they suddenly rush from the centre to the side of the cup, be sure that it is going to rain very hard. If the air bubbles assemble in the centre and then pass to the side of the cup in a deliberate way, you must still prepare for what the weather forecasts would call "some showers." But if the bubbles refuse to stir from the centre of the cup you may go forth to your labors assured of a fine day.—Boston Globe.

It is conjectured that a specific may yet be found for every ill that flesh is heir to. However this may be, certainly the best specific yet found for diseases of the blood is Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and most diseases originate from impure blood.
