until the day when the stranger is driven off the soil of my native land. This is my mode of protesting against the invasion. I am no longer of the age to defend Spain, with sword in hand, but I am still ready to sacrifice my life and fortune for her."

"In the same way that I am ready to die for my mother country," rejoined the lieutenant.

"In which we should both do our duty," concluded the hidalgo. "Let us drop this sad subject."

"I ask nothing better; only in our position toward each other, of what can we speak?"

"Of things of my country and yours. I lived a long while at the Court of our good King Carlos IV and I have participated in many events."

"Which will certainly interest me if your lordship would kindly relate them."

"I held a post in the palace and should do so now if my unfortunate sovereign had not fallen into the trap your Emperor laid for him at Bayonne—"

"Here I must bid you pause my lord Marquis," interrupted the West Indian. You are venturing on delicate ground—where I refuse to follow you, for I am a devoted soldier and a passionate admirer of Napoleon."

"Quite right," muttered Don Inigo.

"Well, captain, tell me about Paris. I visited it before your revolution."

"You will find it greatly changed."
"Oh, I have not the least longing to return, but I am not indifferent to what goes on there. No doubt you came from it?"

"Straight. I was there only a fortnight ago—at least at Malmaison."

"Your Empress' summer resort, is it not?"

"Yes, my lord, where I spent the whole of a week."

"Then you should know the members of her retinue?"

"Not all, but I know more than one."

"Are you acquainted with Mlle. de Garve?"

A thunderbolt falling into the wine glass which he had just emptied would not have produced a more prodigious effect upon the American than this question delivered at close quarters by a Spaniard, in the hall of the old mansion in Aranda in the heart of a hostile country. He was so astounded that he did not respond.

"I ask you this," went on the marquis, "because the young lady is of Spanish origin. Her mother came from Teruel, a town of Aragon, not very far from here. She married a Frenchman, who belonged to the army as you do and became a general. He was killed in one of your battles in Germany."

"Austerlitz," observed Paul.
"I was told that the Empress Josephine had taken care of her daughter."

"She attached her to her person as reading woman."

"So this girl has become wholly French who counts among her maternal ancestors the famous Isabella of Segura who died of grief upon her affianced husband's bier—in the thirteenth century in the reign of King Don Jayme of Aragon."

Fontenay, as an American, had never heard Isabella of Segura named, or this legend mentioned of "the Lovers of Teruel," though celebrated through Spain and he had reasons to think that Marguerite de Gavre was ignorant of her illustrious ancestor's story, for she was born in France and her mother had died in childhood. But, without suspecting it the noble Marquis had sharpened the curiosity of the lieutenant who thought it a good chance to inform himself upon the family of the lady he loved. In the course of the farewell audience which the Empress granted him, she had not been explicit on this head—perhaps because she was no better informed.

"Has Mlle. de Gavre any substantial interests in Spain?" he inquired.

"Most important ones. A fortune deposited in the Bank of Madrid, considerable real estate, the whole inheritance of an uncle who died about six months ago and forgot to cut her off! Events have prevented her entering into possession. She may never do so—and I hope, ardently, that this splendid windfall will never pass into French hands. She also has claims upon the treasures of the Seguras, hidden wealth spoken of in the old chronicles, but if it exists, it will never go out of Spain for nobody knows where it is buried."

While Don Inigo was descending, light spread by degrees in his hearer's mind. He recollected the robbery in la Malmaison just before his departure and he was already inflamed with the hope of re-encountering the thief who had escaped the searches of the French police. He hastened to inquire of the Marquis if Mlle. de Gavre had any relatives in Spain, and the nobleman replied, after a little hesitation:

"There is one living whom she may term so, for it is the custom among us to call any elderly kindredman tio—which means 'uncle,' you know. But he is only her mother's cousin-german."

"Are you acquainted?"
"He is one of my best friends and one of the greatest enemies of your nation. He would never be comforted after seeing the great property escape him which he would have employed to defend his country."
"Is he here?"

"No. If I knew where he was I should not tell you, but I am totally ignorant. I dare say that he is busy somewhere up in the mountains organizing a guerilla of which your army will hear something."

"What might his name be?" bluffed demanded the American in his colonial frankness.

"Do not be displeased, senior officer, if I keep silent," replied Don Inigo. "What would you think of me if I were to put you on the track of a brave leader who will do you all the mischief he can and under whose orders I should be proud to serve, were I younger. Let us return to Senorita de Gavre, if you please. Your replies teach me that you saw her at the Empress Josephine's court and that she is not yet wed. I dare say she will marry some Frenchman?"

Paul had a strong inclination to proclaim that the lady was intended for him, but he confined himself to responding:
"I should not wonder, and I wish her no worse fate."

"May heaven forgive her for failing to follow the noble examples of her race!" sighed the marquis.

Fontenay was going to object to this over-zealous patriot, that the lady had French blood also in her veins, when Tournesol entered and said:

"At what o'clock do we make a start in the morning, lieutenant?"

Truths for Our Girls.

Almost every newspaper or periodical we take up contains some kind of advice to young women, until you must be tired of the theme. Much is said that is excellent, but before you rely upon it implicitly I wish you would notice whether it is the advice of a man or a woman. Neither sex can understand the wants of the other as well as they can the wants of their own, and a great many men who write for the the newspapers know less about the female understanding than they do of the mysteries of dress-making, or the management of a cross baby.

You have advice, certainly; I shall only tell you a few well-known truths. Do not make matrimony the sole end and aim of your existence. Now that colleges, schools of art, and the learned professions are being opened to women, you need not accept the first man who offers himself, whether above him or not, because you have to be supported somehow, and it is not respectable for a woman to earn her own living. It is better for the moral condition of society that girls should become lawyers, doctors, artists, telegraph-operators, book-keepers or anything that will support them honestly, rather than become the wives of men they cannot love. Girls, never marry for the poor boon of either a home or a husband. Do not sell yourselves for gold, for a marriage without love is an inferno more terrible than Dante ever pictured. It is better to be a cheerful contented "old maid" than be an unhappy discontented wife.

Some of the noblest women who ever existed have never married, because they preferred "single blessedness" to "wedded misery." Of course it is better to be married if the right one comes; but if he does not, do not fret about it. There is no greater mistake than to affirm either that matrimony is the universal vocation of a woman, or that a sour temper and discontented spirit are inseparable from the condition of single life. There never was an unhappy "old maid" yet who would not have been quite as unhappy as a wife, and would have created double mischief, for she would have made two people miserable instead of one.—Ex.

A Chimney Builder's Dilemma.

To be caught at the top of a chimney one hundred feet high is not one of the ordinary contingencies of life. But if any of our readers look forward to such an experience they are recommended either to hold fast to the apparatus provided for their descent, or else to wear woolen stockings, which may be easily unravelled. It was by the latter precaution that an ingenious Scotch chimney builder escaped giving an involuntary reproduction of St. Simeon Stylites, without, perhaps, the patience or the piety. Being about to descend for the night from his lofty perch he discovered, to his consternation, that the rope by which he was to get down had fallen to the ground. In this dilemma, he first resorted to his friends below, who at once put in motion the various futile but good-natured devices to which friends under such circumstances usually resort. One was for throwing up a stone with a cord attached; another wanted to build up a stairway inside to the top of the chimney. One after another of these sagacious expedients was tried and failed, and the prospect seemed fair that the luckless chimney builder would spend an uncomfortable night on his turret. At last, however, the bright thought occurred to him of unraveling his stockings. The yarn, happily, reached the ground, a small cord was attached to it and this drawn up, secured in turn a stout rope—just as we read in the wonderful prison escapes—and the "courageous and ingenious chimney builder," we read, "descended in safety, to the great satisfaction of the hundreds assembled on the spot," and not a little, it may be imagined, to his own. But if ever after he wears any but woolen stockings of the longest and raveliest pattern he is surely the most ungrateful as well as the most improvident of chimney builders.

NONE OTHER GENUINE

Is a most loathsome, dangerous, and prevalent malady. It is a blood disease, usually of serofulous origin, and for which local treatment is useless. Before health is possible, the poison must be eradicated from the system, and to do this the disease must be treated through the blood. For this purpose no remedy is so effective as Ayer's Sarsaparilla.
SUCCESSFULLY
"For the past eight years, I have been severely afflicted with Catarrh, none of the many remedies I tried affording me any relief. My digestion was considerably impaired, and my sleep disturbed by phlegm dropping into my throat. In September last I resolved to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla, began to use it at once, and am glad to testify to the great improvement in my health."

"My daughter, 16 years old, was afflicted with Catarrh from her fifth year. Last August she was TREATED WITH
Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and after three months of this treatment she was completely cured. It was a most extraordinary case, as any druggist here can testify."—Mrs. D. W. Barnes, Valparaiso, Neb.

Death in Black Fog.
LONDON, Jan. 13.—The Home Office has ordered the coroners of the metropolis to prepare a return of the people killed by accident during the prevalence of the recent fogs. The coroner of the docks alone had 18 cases of fatal accidents. The Millwall Dock Company has publicly expressed its willingness to consider any scheme and to go to any expense to prevent such accidents in the future, and it is hoped that other companies will take the hint and take some steps in the same direction before legislative means are adopted to compel them to do so.
