one man, who, when I had fastened on the wall the text "Except that a man be every man by the hand, and then as soon hear as much profanity in the camps as might be expected of a large and mixed company. In some camps I never heard an oath nor rude jest, while in others heard both, especially the former. The hospitality shown to missionaries in the camps is well known to be as great as might be expected in any other place. I found bosses and cooks in some campa eager to make a bed on the floor or table in order to give me their bunks. In the camps there is not such an opportunity for religious work as in our more highly favored outside settlements. The men at nights come in cold and hungry, and after supper moccasins are to be repaired, axes ally having personal conversation about the Saviour with a few after the close of the address. Yet while this is true, I had opportunities on the road, in the camps especially on Sabbath, and in other places of speaking of the necessity of seeking and serving God. I found out thus that the lumberman is as willing to converse about spiritual things as those who are at home. One night I spent in a camp in
