The Cure For

Scrofula was once supposed to be the touch of royalty. To-day, many grateful people know that the "sovereign remedy" is Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This powerful alterative extirpates "the evil" by thoroughly eliminating all the stumorous poison from the blood. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

When I was a babe I dozed and dreamed
That God from beyond the clouds with me
Had come to dwell in my mother's arms
And feed me with love eternally.

When I was a child I read and dreamed
That far in the fairy mystery
Of Oberon's realm the Queen of Love
Her bower would keep eternally.

When I was a maid I mused and dreamed
That Life her intent had told to me—
To love was enough for one to do—
To love and be loved eternally.

When I was a bride I sang and dreamed
That Life had no more a minor key;
Love's symphony swelled with joy, I said,
This love will endure eternally.

When I was a mother once more I dreamed,
That out of the depths had come to me
The marvelous pearl of love I sought—
The love that would stay eternally.

But now I am old. No more I dream.
For Knowledge hath frightened dreams away.

Experience sits behind my hearth—
Together these wise ones seem to say:

Think not that a changeless, perfect love
Can dwell in a changing, human heart—
To live, to long, to need, are one—
To love is forever a thing apart.

The love that abides and satisfies,
That ne'er from its chosen home is driven,
Alone by a master soul is felt.
Alone to the perfect heart is given.

SAVED FROM A SIN.

Perhaps, although it does not always follow that because a young couple are madly in love with each other that they will be happy in a cottage or on humble fare. Nevertheless, the story in view will illustrate the fact.

Edward Hollingsworth, then only a young clerk, married a banker's daughter against her father's wishes and took her home to the poor little furnished rooms he was able to hire.

For a time everything seemed to go happily until the husband received a small legacy, which was expended in furniture too elegant for their condition and in dresses too fine for a clerk's wife. They began to compete with much richer families, and the young wife little knew of the debts into which they were plunging.

One night the husband returned home to find his wife in tears.

She said a crazy person had called that day and insisted that their pier glasses were not paid for, and when ordered out of the house became abusive. She asked to know what it all meant.

"That he was crazy, as you say, dearest."

"Oh, I'm so glad," said foolish little Rosa, smiling. "I thought there might be something at the bottom of his talk; and since it isn't so, you will give me that new garnet velvet dress I spoke of, and a pearl spray for my hair—pearls become me so well. You'll let me have it to-morrow, Edward, in time for Mrs. Rushland's dinner?"

"If I can, Rosa," said Edward; "but what would you say if I were to ask you to wear your old dresses this winter?"

"What a joke!" cried Rosa. "But you told grandpa I should never want for anything. You can't be growing stingy, love?"

"You shall have the money, Rosa," said Edward.

His face had turned very white, but she did not see it. After awhile he arose and put on his coat.

"I must go out awhile," he said. "I have business to attend to." And she saw him unconsciously take from his bosom the keys of his office desk.

"Going to the office to-night?" she asked.

"No, no. Why should you think so?" he said, and turned fiery-red.

Rosa felt frightened. She could not tell why. She went to the door with her husband, and watched him down the street. Then she went back to the parlor and picked up the daily paper. The first paragraph her eyes fell upon was the account of the arrest of a confidential clerk.

"He was honest until extravagant women made him their prey," added the writer. "Extravagance is the road to ruin."

The paper fell from Rosa's fingers. Suddenly a flood of light seemed to illuminate the darkness of her life.

"I am an extravagant woman," she said. "I am driving my husband to ruin. To-night he may do something to supply my foolish wants that will cover him with infamy and part us forever. I will follow him."

A great waterproof cloak with a hood lay upon a chair near by. Rosa seized it and wrapped it about her and flew out into the street.

She turned her steps as by instinct toward her husband's place of business. It was a large building, and the janitor stood at the door.

"My husband is in his office, is he not?" she asked. "I'm to meet him here."

"Yes. Walk up, ma'am," said the old man, and Rosa flew upstairs. She opened the door. The gas had been lit, and its rays fell over the head of her husband as he sat at his desk. She crept up behind him and peeped over his shoulder. An empty check lay before him, and opposite stood a paper bearing the signature of his employer, which he with careful strokes was copying letter by letter.

"Edward!" shrieked Rosa, and her white hand descended upon the paper. "Edward!"

The man started to his feet.

"God led me here, Edward," sobbed his wife. "Oh! Edward, is this the first time?"

"The very first, Rosa," said the man.

"It is my fault," said Rosa. "My extravagance had maddened you. Burn that paper and come away."

In a moment more the check was a little heap of ashes and Rosa sat upon her husband's knee, hiding her head on his shoulder.

"We will sell all the furniture—all that we own. The rest we will give back. My jewels shall go. I will wear calico. We will be honest and forget our vanity," she said, "and I will be a true helpmeet to you, instead of being your bane and curse, as I have been."

Then they went home together.

Neither ever forgot that evening. And though people pitied the banker's daughter for her humble surroundings, she was happier than she had ever been in her life.
