A STIFF-NECKED GENERATION!

FROM BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

CHAPTER VI.—Continued.

ROSAMUND AS A CONTRAST.

We have now a bird's-eye view of the general position of our dramatic persona.
Lord Hartland is to marry Rosamund, Aunt Julia is to dowry the bride, the two are to live at Hartland Abbey, and Lady Caroline is thus to be free to bring out her next daughter.

Lord Hartland showed no disposition to encroach beyond the barrier-line drawn by his fair cousin in the last chapter; it might even have seemed to an ill-natured spectator that he was, if anything, still less disposed to quit his present foothold than the young lady was to have him do so.
If he were a single degree more friendly with her than usual one day, he swung back like a pendulum till he was a full pace behind what he had been the next; it was a momentary notice had been taken of Rosamund, perhaps unavoidably evoked by circumstances, she was sure to be annoyingly swamped in a general survey or observation immediately thereafter; and if he had been caught bestowing so much as a glance of admiration, he turned away his eyes as if from beholding vanity.

The poor man was frightened—that was the truth.
He had no particular turn for matrimony; and the remembrance of an unhappy childhood, rendered so by ill-mated parents, together with some more recent experiences of a like nature, had made him shy of taking the plunge on his own account. Not being in love, he preferred to defer the evil day.

As for Rosamund, he liked Rosamund —well enough. It was not her but it—the whole thing—he shirked and dreaded.
If he had been let alone—if there had been no delighted looks, and fond inquiries, and thinly veiled anxiety at the Abbey, no stately unbending and grim approval at King's Common—he would have got on excellently with the unmanageable, in-flamable wild young thing who was metaphorically kicking up her heels all over in the place, in the joy of her newborn freedom.

The truth,—the real, the actual truth, —and let anxious guardians and match-makers read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest it,—was this, that had it been possible for every sort of recollection of Lady Julia's project to have been blotted out of Hartland's memory; had he of himself and by himself found out the beauties and the blemishes and all the secret springs of that bewitching and bewildering ef-ference which now, as it were, danced before his eyes in a Rosamund unapproachable and unattainable; had they met alone, unnoticed and unheeded, and each unprepared for the other,—his heart had been hers long, long before he knew.

"But we really must come to some sort of an understanding before long."

Lady Caroline was alone with her sister, of course, when such a remark could be made. "It was all very well as long as the girls were in the schoolroom, Julia; but now that Rosamund has been out for three months and been seen everywhere, there is nothing to wait for. If there is to be anything between her and Hartland, it must be now, or never."

"My dear Caroline, I really—you see there is no particular hurry."

"Now that is you, Julia, all the world over. No hurry! And Catherine only a year younger, and Dolly close behind her.
To talk of there being no hurry, by which I presume you mean that the affair may hang on and on indefinitely, is absurd.
Either it must be now, or not at all."

Lady Julia was silent.

"Does Hartland mean anything, or does he not?"

"He has never said a word about drawing back," replied Lady Julia. Give him time.

"Oh, time! I wish you could understand," cried Lady Caroline impatiently, and had Julia known, there was more reason for her impatience than appeared.
"I cannot make you see with my eyes,— I never could," proceeded the speaker, stating a fact for which the Abbey folks had daily cause to bless their good luck; "but, however, it is of no use talking," she added, and indeed she had been on the brink of an indiscretion. "I have my own reasons,—ahem—why, you yourself, Julia, have often pitied poor Beatrice Waterfield, who introduces a new daughter year by year, till she has now a perfect train behind her wherever she goes. Upon my word," exclaimed Lady Caroline, with an energy that yet showed a returning self-satisfaction and good humor—"upon my word, I never think of Beatrice and her seven daughters behind her, without a shudder."

"Seven, dear? Only six, I think," corrected Julia, gently.

"Seven," pronounced her sister, in a voice that might have spoken their doom.

"You forget the schoolgirl, Diana—" "Oh, I beg your pardon, I thought you spoke of the girls who were out—"

"And in another year Diana will also be out."

"Oh, we will hope for the best," said Lady Julia pleasantly; "and I know, for my part, I cannot but admire the unselfishness and sweet temper with which Beatrice makes the best of those poor unattractive girls. Somehow, when one looks at them beside Rosamund—"

"Yes, beside Rosamund," assented Lady Caroline, "beside Rosamund they lose all the color they possess. I am not a blindly partial parent, as you know, Julia; but I cannot help seeing that when she is present, all animation as she usually is, those others seem absolute dulness itself.
And, moreover, it is not only the Waterfield girls, it is every one. Now, is it not?"

"Certainly"—Lady Julia was to the full as amiably prejudiced—"certainly; you are right in that," she said. "Still, one does see very ordinary girls very well married."

"Not where there are six of them," cried Lady Caroline, almost eagerly; "at least, not when all six are everywhere present. No man wants to marry six girls; and as for singling out any one from the rest, and expecting to find any single thing in her that he did not find in all the others, he might as well try to fix his affections upon a blade of grass out of a meadow. I do not say they are not amiable girls, and well bred—"

"Sweet, gentle," murmured Lady Julia.

"Unattractive," Julia.

"Did I say 'unattractive'? But I only said they were so to me. To other people
—"

"Oh, nonsense, my dear! if you cannot find attractions in them, no one can," said Lady Caroline, with a shade of contempt in her more kindly tone.

"Are you not a little severe, Caroline?"

It was the nearest approach to a remonstrance Lady Julia ever made.

"Severe? Not at all," Lady Caroline promptly quashed the idea. "I have not a word to say against the Waterfields," she continued. "They are almost the only acquaintance we have, with whom we can comfortably associate. We have known them all our lives; and, all things considered, I should be sorry to lose them out of the neighborhood. Beatrice is invariably friendly, and anxious we should go there, and that the young people should meet, and I have made no sort of objection to Rosamund's being frequently at the Grange, now that she has less to do at home. She is there at this moment—"

But she was nothing of the kind; she entered even as the last words were spoken, and with her the young ladies who had also been the theme of the above discourse.

"Mamma, I have brought over some hungry people for luncheon," said Rosamund, making her way to embrace her aunt, while Lady Caroline advanced with her usual air of formal civility to greet the new-comers. "I found them, and I brought them, and they are going to stop the afternoon if you press them very hard," she added merrily; "and Aunt Julia will just please to do the same, and Hartland is here too,"—and with the name of Hartland the boldness of the proposal was explained.

"How do you do, Eleanor—Amy—Violet?" said Lady Caroline, kissing steadily through the trio. "Rosamund was fortunate in finding you at home, and able to come over this beautiful day. We must make the most of all the summer that remains."

"Yes. It is wonderfully hot for September," observed Miss Waterfield, seating herself. "Are we not interrupting you, Lady Caroline?"

"Not at all, my dear; my morning's work is over."

"So you can stop a little and keep Rosamund company," proceeded the hostess.
"She is rather left to herself nowadays, not being one of a nice merry party like you, all so nearly of an age. You can hardly know what it is to be dull. You are quite independent of other society.
You must have so many resources among yourselves."

All the time she was looking at them, and Lady Julia knew what was in her heart.

If Hartland would only come in now! come in and see this radiant young creature and contrast her with those correct girls, sitting so properly still and ladylike in their chairs,—surely some sentiment, some emotion, must for very shame be kindled in his breast. He could not be so insensate as not to feel, so dull as not to see, the difference. She tapped the floor with her foot impatiently. Where was he? What was he doing? What hindered him from entering?

Had Hartland come over of himself?
Had Rosamund been to the Abbey to fetch her aunt, and finding her absent, fetched her cousin instead? Or, had he been merely met with by the way?

She looked at her daughter; but Rosamund, securely audacious as was her wont when Hartland was near, was shocking to relate, swinging on one leg with an unflinching eye direct upon herself—an eye moreover, which plainly said, "Find out if you can. But there is nothing to be learned from me."

Now that very morning Rosamund had had a long walk alone with Hartland, and although not a word had passed between them which all the world might not have heard, each had been fully aware of all that would have been prophesied and hoped for, had the incident come to light; and it had been quite understood between them, though the understanding had been a tacit one, that neither was, in schoolboy phrase, to peach.

A spark of seriousness would have spoilt all.

It was this which lent to Rosamund's brow the archness which puzzled Lady Caroline.

To Invade the United States.

TORONTO, ONT., June 26.—Another announcement of interest is made by The Dodd's Medicine Company Ltd., of this city, to the effect that they have decided to establish a factory and warehouse at Buffalo, N. Y., in order to supply the growing demand for Dodd's Kidney Pills in the United States. This remedy has never been advertised or placed on sale in the United States, but the popularity of the remedy and the news of its successes in Canada quickly reached the people of the neighboring republic, and orders have poured in, unsolicited, from every State in the Union. The capacity of the Toronto factory is taxed to supply the Canadian market and the management feel that they can only do justice to both foreign and home demands by invading the United States and establishing a depot and factory there.
