his wife in his arms, and laid her upon a soft couch in the long drawing-room where he had borne her, and then raising his voice he shouted :

a doctor at once ! and guard well that cursed fiend that he may not escape! He shall hang for this !"

Then he looked into the pallid face before him, and with a groan he gasped : "She is dead, oh, pitying Heaven, she is dead !" But she was not dead, and the doctor who arrived a few moments later, looked at her, and said : "She is not dead, but she is fatally wounded."

She opened her eyes to find her husband kneeling beside her, and reaching out her hand, whispered faintly :

"I am dying, Lionel, but I saved your live, and that one thought is so sweet !" "My wife, my precious wife !" he sobbed, burying his face in the pillows beside the pale one so near his own. "Is it possible that you are going to leave me when I need you so ?"

"Hush, you must not excite her," the doctor whispered cautiously, toucning his shoulder. "For her hours are numbered."

"I am going to leave you soon." the beautiful, dying wife murmured, her hands clasped over her faintly throbbing heart. "I shall not be with you much longer, Lionel, put I shall meet her in the other world. Ah, Gabrielle, my dear, dear friend, you will not have to go alone now." Her blue eyes were closed, and her white hands were fluttering about as if searching for something, but when they touched his loved hands they became quiet once more. "Be kind to our little one," she said with an effort, and her voice was so low that he had to bend his head to catch the faint sound. "Be always kind to our little one, Lionel, and do not forget me, for I love you so."

That was all she said, for with a peaceful sigh she sunk to rest, her hand clasbed within that of her beloved husband, and the whispering limes outside were murmuring to each other softly as if they knew that death was near.

"If you please, Sir Lionel, the man who is dying out on the lawn says he has a confession to make," said one of the servants approaching, and holding his hat in one was so strong that I feared a verdict from With a cry of anguish Sir Lionel caught those who were familiar with the circumstances. The only hope for him was to have the case tried in another county. When the hour came for me to address the court I had arranged to have a conspicuous "John, James, some one of you, go for | and well-known figure around the town to cry out, 'Hang him ! Hang him !' as soon as my client's name was mentioned. My plan was to show in this way that there was prejudice against my client and thus secure a change of venue.

> The court-room was crowded when the prisoner was brought in. He took his seat opposite the Judge and then turned around and viewed the threatening-looking throng that surrounded him.

> "Hang him! Hang him! He's a horse thief !" rang out in the court room. It was shouted in such a cruel way that I was satisfied that I would have no trouble in securing the charge of venue.

"Hang him, I say ; he's a horse thief !" echoed again through the court house, and before the officers or anyone else could interfere I'll be blamed if they didn't hang him.

Catholic Study of Scripture.

ROME, April 4.-Pope Leo has just completed an examination of the question of the study of the scriptures. His Holiness has devoted inquiry especially to the diverse opinions of savants on great biblical questions. He will proceed to indite a letter to bishops requiring them to enjoin upon their flocks a more profound study of the scriptures, and a larger place in the schools for the study of critical explanation of hermeneutics. The Pope urges the necessity of keeping in the track of modern progress and discovery, in order to adapt Catholicism to the needs of the day.
