heart—it being presumed that the heart was in its right place. All was over in the space of a few seconds, and the prey impaled on the point of the knife.

"Well, I call that cruel," said a voice close by.

"Oh no, Miss Waterfield; a wasp is a wasp; if you don't kill him he will sting, if not kill you. At least that's the theory." He was bound to make some defence.

"Have you many at the Abbey?"

"Swarms," replied Hartland, picking off the one he had disposed of. "I say here is another. Quiet now, Miss Waterfield, don't you stir: there—he has calmed down now; no, he is off again, the suspicious rascal; he smells the blood of the slain. Now, quietly, quietly. Plague upon him! he is twice the trouble the other was. But I shan't be done—make up your mind to that, my friend; so if it lies between us—and down came the knife, and the deed was done.

Even Violet Waterfield had been keen on the quarry. "You are clever," she now cried, and examined the defunct wasp with more interest than she could have supposed possible.

"It is of no use cutting them in two, you know," said Hartland, and he proceeded to explain.

"What are you two whispering about over there?" exclaimed Lady Caroline, who had twice addressed herself to Lord Hartland, and twice been obliged to end her sentence as though it had been meant for the general circle, which is not a pleasant thing to have to do.

No one now replied.

"Rosamund," said her mother, looking around. "Alas! she wished she let Hartland alone, and kept her wits for another encounter. It was too late now; a note she had foolishly left lying on the table when interrupted by her first visitor, and which she most particularly desired not to have had seen, was in her daughter's hands, and it was but too evident that Rosamund had neither heard nor seen anything else since it came there.

"Provoking!" muttered Lady Caroline to herself, and her brow once more clouded over. "If I could only have consulted Hartland first; but now, it will have to be spoken about before them all, and of course Rosamund will get her way." (Aloud.) "What did you say, my dear?" for she was being in her turn addressed.

"When did this come, mamma?"

"What? What have you got there?"

and Lady Caroline put up her eyeglass.

"This," said Rosamund, holding up the note, which it was easier to do than to name the writer.

"Oh, that from the barracks," said Lady Caroline, and the glass dropped with a jerk. "I forget when. Some time this morning."

"Have you answered it?"

"Not yet. Your aunt came in."

"What shall you say?" Rosamund was growing bolder.

"Oh, I do not know, I am sure, my dear," was however, all the satisfaction Lady Caroline deigned to bestow. "It will require consideration."

"What does your mother mean to do, Eleanor?" pursued Lady Caroline, who saw at a glance that Julia would be no help, and, indeed, had not meant to tell her of the dilemma, had circumstances not obliged her to do so.

"About Major Gilbert's luncheon-party?" said Eleanor. "I think we shall go—some of us."

"Why do you call it 'Major Gilbert's party'?" corrected Lady Caroline, quickly. "The card says, 'Major Gilbert and the officers' of the regiment. I do not suppose that Major Gilbert has anything more to do with it than any of the rest. Major Gilbert is the least presentable of the set, and yet he is the one who always seems to put himself forward."

"Perhaps he may be put forward—a different thing, Lady Caroline. You see, being in command at present, he can hardly help taking the lead," observed Miss Waterfield, good-naturedly.

"You must be mistaken, my dear. Majors do not take command. There must be a colonel to do that."

"There is no colonel at present there."

"There must be a colonel somewhere."

It seems to me as if this Major Gilbert never has anything to keep him away from amusements; no duties at home, no calls on his time, nothing, in short, to hinder him from idling away whole days in pleasure."

"Young men must have their recreations," murmured the kind-hearted Julia. "It makes me quite wretched to hear from Hartland of the dread marches they had to make in India, and the hours they had to be drilling in that terrible climate, and—"

"I doubt if they do any drilling at all at Longminster," interrupted her sister. "And as for marching, the only marches Major Gilbert ever takes are over here, or to some other house where he may idle away his time, and fancy himself in request. I am sure I—we have shown him plainly enough that there is no occasion for his coming so often. We never intended to make this place a barrack playground; but he is the sort of person on whom every kind of hint is thrown away. One cannot exactly be rude."

No one raised an eye. Lady Caroline was doing herself injustice; she not only could be, but was, the rudest woman in the world when she chose. Moreover she was now showing herself to be also the most unwise, since, however, much it cost her, she should have refrained from speaking ill of one for whom she entertained so strong a personal animus, in the presence of others, by some of whom at least this was not shared. Even by those who did not particularly care for the Gilbert in question, Lady Caroline, who had more than once partaken of his hospitality, accepted his arm, and been glad to avail herself of his services, was heard with displeasure.

But having now got the bit between her teeth, there was no stopping her.

"There are some people who never know when to come and when to go," she proceeded. "If I ask Major Gilbert to luncheon, I do not mean that he is to remain till dinner-time. If he comes over to call, he means to be invited to tea, and is sure to suggest a game of some kind or other afterwards. All this would be very well, of course, if he were a friend—if he were on intimate terms with our family; but when we all dislike him—"

"Oh my dear Caroline—I must really—I cannot agree to that. We do not dislike him at the abbey."

"You do not dislike him, Julia?" Lady Caroline's tone was rising.

"I—no—really, I cannot say I do."

"Well I must say you astonish me, my dear. It was only last week that you agreed with me perfectly about this very Major Gilbert, and I told you how much I wished he would let us alone; and now you change about, and just because others are here—"

"My dear!"

"—Well, my dear, do, pray, say for once what you do think."

"My dear!" Julia was still unable for more than a slight increase of emphasis. "You told me yourself you could not call him a gentleman," pursued Lady Caroline, hunting her down.

"But still—"

An Important Scientific Discovery.

Nerviline, the latest discovered pain remedy, may safely challenge the world for a substitute that will as speedily and promptly check inflammatory action. The highly penetrating properties of Nerviline make it never failing in all cases of rheumatism, neuralgia, cramps, pains in the back and side, headache, lumbago, etc. It possesses marked stimulating and counter irritant properties, and at once subdues all inflammatory action. Ormand & Walsh, druggists, Peterboro, write: "Our customers speak well of Nerviline." Large bottles 25 cents. Try Nerviline the great internal and external pain cure. Sold by all druggists and country dealers.

Board of Health.

Dr. Bourque, secretary of the Board of Health for the county of Kent, has received the following communication from the secretary of the Provincial Board.

FREDERICTON, N. B., June 20, 1893.

Dear Sir:

The Provincial Board of Health desires to again call the attention of Local Boards to the probability of Cholera being brought into this Province during the present summer, to the great necessity of extra precautions being taken to obviate this, and to prevent it obtaining a foothold should it be introduced by any means.

Particular attention should be given to this in counties or towns upon the border of the Province, along the coast, or such as have any direct communication with places outside the Province. This remark applies with nearly equal force to every county in the Province.

Special attention to cleanliness is also of not less importance at the present time and should at this season of the year receive immediate attention throughout the entire Province.

Cholera is essentially a filthy disease, and although it may not originate in this way, it is certain that all insanitary conditions favor its propagation very largely. Cleanliness in every respect, absolute and continued, always so essential to health, is at the present time of more than ordinary importance.

In view of this it is earnestly hoped these matters may receive prompt attention from all Local Health Authorities, and the cordial co-operation of the people in general in every community.
