A Cocagne Man's Death.

COCAGNE, Aug. 28.—[Special].—"We find that the deceased, Alexis Caisey, came to his death on the morning of Aug. 25, through the free use of spirituous liquors."

This was the verdict of a coroner's jury, presided over by Dr. C. O. LeBlanc, coroner, of Buctouche, on Saturday last. The story of the unfortunate man's death is a whole volume of temperance sermons in itself.

Caisey was a farmer, about 45 years old, and lived on Cocagne Island. He was a widower, his wife having died last winter, leaving one child. On the morning of Wednesday last, he was accosted in front of the Bay View Hotel, in this village, by Simon and Oliver Bourgeois, who had already, as they admitted at the inquest, taken a few drinks. Caisey is said to have been quite sober at the time. He had some local repete as a dancer, and Simon Bourgeois invited him into the hotel, promising him a drink for each dance. Bourgeois stated at the inquest that he was not in a condition to remember what followed, but this link in the story was supplied by Charles Woods, proprietor of the Bay View.

Woods testified that after the first dance he asked Caisey what he would have and at his request gave him a glass of rum. The glass was a large one, holding nearly half a pint, and he filled it about two-thirds full, drawing the liquor directly from the cask. Three or four times this was repeated, until finally, about an hour after the first drink, he refused to sell any more. Caisey, who did not then show any effects of the large dose he had taken, started up the street. In front of Rouben Gogain's he began to stagger and was assisted into the house. Half an hour afterwards, he fell from his chair and Mr. Gogain's people assisted him to a lounge. This was about noon on Wednesday, and he speedily fell asleep and did not wake until ten the following morning.

He complained of a terrible burning sensation in his stomach and called constantly for water. Although in a half stupor, and scarcely conscious of what he was doing, he managed to arise and leave the house. He went but a short distance before he fell on the sidewalk. Fred Comeau and Geo. Cormier saw him lying there and took him to their home, where they put him to bed. Until late Thursday evening, nobody imagined that Caisey's condition was so serious. His weakness and incoherence of speech were thought to be the symptoms of only an ordinary spree. Shortly before midnight the symptoms became more alarming, and a messenger was despatched for a priest. Father Cormier, of Cocagne, was absent in Memramcook, but Father Masse, of Grand Digue, was secured. He arrived at two o'clock Friday morning, but Caisey had died a few moments before.

The general sentiment here demanded a thorough investigation of the case, with a view of finding where the blame rested, if upon anybody. Coroner LeBlanc arrived here on Saturday and impelled the following jury: Fred Hebert, Demas LeBlanc, Peter J. Arsenault, Laurent Bourgeois, A. J. Dysart, Raphael Legere and Thos. Bourque.

Coroner LeBlanc examined the body, which was already much decomposed. He found a few bruises on the skin of the forehead, temples and left arm, evidently the result of falls, but there was no doubt that death was caused by the excessive amount of liquor which deceased had taken. The jury brought the verdict above stated, no blame being attached to any one.
