For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags.—Prov. 23 and 21 verse.

A Temperance Story.

"What on earth are you doing, Sidney, and where is Chester?"

The little six-year-old was playing on the lawn in front of the drawing-room window, where the mother's loving eyes were watching him.

"Me playing d'unkn man, mamma—Tester comes d'ectly and take me to big, dark house were d'unkn man goes."

At this moment Chester rushed out from behind the house; and dragged the little fellow off, kicking and screaming, to the pretended prison. A thrill of pain pierced Mrs. Cary's heart, as she turned to greet her husband, who had just entered the room.

"What is it, Alice? Something has gone wrong." He gazed anxiously into the clouded face of his beautiful wife, usually all sunshine.

"Sidney," she replied, "I cannot tell what makes my heart so heavy. Chester and little Sidney are playing drunkard. I saw Sidney reeling from side to side, shaking his fists at imaginary foes, and when I asked him what he was doing, he said 'playing d'unkn man.' O Sidney, suppose they should ever turn out to be drunkards."

"Foolish child!" he exclaimed, kissing her. "They will have sense enough to know how to use liquor for their own good, I assure you. The idea of worrying lest two boys of six and eight summers should become drunkards!"

"But, Sidney, you know how fond our boys are of wine, especially little Syd. I often wonder if we are not wrong in having it on our table."

"Nonsense. Come, Alice, stop these gloomy forebodings, or I shall go back to the office. If our boys are not men enough to use the stuffs as their father does, they deserve their fate."

"O Sidney!" The cruel words sounded strangely harsh from the lips of him who had never before spoken unkindly to her. She had not noticed his manner until now, being troubled about her other treasures, but a sudden glance into his face made her own turn pale with dread.

"Sidney, you have been drinking!" The mingled anguish and reproach in her tone was enough to bring remorse to the heart of the most hard-nosed criminal. But Mr. Cary was determined not to quail before a woman.

"Well, Alice, what of it? Can't I take a social glass with a friend without coming home to meet a scolding wife and no supper? I think you had better mind your own business—your meddling in my affairs is becoming unbearable."

"I hear the tea bell, Sidney." Her face was ashy pale and her voice was husky. "Shall we take our tea alone this evening? The children might worry you."

"As you please," was his short reply. Mrs. Cary left the room, and found Chester and Sidney impatiently awaiting her coming.

"Me so hung'ry, mamma: can't me hab some t'ue for supper?" begged Sidney, rubbing his sleepy eyes with a pair of chubby fists.

"Papa is sick, little ones, and mamma must take tea with him this evening in the drawing-room. Be good boys and go to bed quietly. Kiss mamma good night."

Chester, try to keep Lucie as still as possible."

Sidney immediately set up a cry for his mother, but was soon pacified when supper was brought in. Mrs. Cary went back to her husband, and soon a servant carried in the evening meal on a tray. Mr. Cary often suffered from headache, and it was no new custom for himself and wife to eat thus in the elegant drawing-room; so no one noticed that anything was wrong that evening.

Twelve years have passed. In a miserable cottage sits a beautiful young girl of sixteen, silently sewing. Her large brown eyes dim with tears, and now and then a tiny drop trickles down the soft, round cheek, and falls on a dainty fabric in her lap. A moan from the bed causes her to start up and dash the tears from her eyes.

"It is time for your medicine, mother."

"I don't want it Lucie, darling, I am going home. Will you call your brothers? I think I am dying."

"Mother! Mother! Oh, what shall I do? I cannot leave you alone, and perhaps I may not find them, after all. Mother, don't leave me! There's no one to live for but you, but now you must die!" Lucie Cary threw herself down beside the bed and buried her face in the pillows.

"My darling, you must try to save your brothers. Go and find them, Lucie, I must say good-bye to them."

Lucie put on her shawl and rushed bare-headed into the street. Instinct led her to the tavern a few blocks away. But suppose they were not there;—the thought made her dizzy and ill. It was early yet; perhaps they were still at work.

On reaching the tavern she peeped through the half-open door. There stood her brothers, just ready to pour down their throats the hellish poison. Lucie rushed in, and as Chester was nearest her, she snatched the glass from his lips.

"Chester, Sidney, mother is dying, and sent for you. Come, oh, come; she is all alone; you will never see her alive again."

Chester put down his glass. "Mother dying? You must be mistaken Lucie. But come along, Syd; we will show her that we are not all lost."

"No, I shan't. Mother is always dying. I don't believe a word of it."

"Come, Sydney, do come and say good-bye to mother; you will not regret it," pleaded Lucie.

"You go along, now. I tell you I'm not going, curse you," he shouted becoming infuriated.

Lucie took Chester's arm—a strong gallant arm when steady—and without another word left the tavern. Silently they walked along, and as silently entered the chamber of death.

"Did you find them, Lucie?" The voice was growing weaker. "Chester has come, mother."

"Oh, where can Sidney be? God protect him. Chester, I am going home. Kneel beside me with Lucie, while I give you my dying blessing."

With one emaciated hand on each bowed head she prayed that heaven would rescue them from sin and bring them safe to glory.

"Mother, I have killed you," sobbed the broken-hearted boy. Then all was still, save the sobbing of the young man and his sister. They thought the death angel had come, but once more the mother opened her eyes.

"Chester, I leave Lucie to you. You cannot care for her and the poison that has blighted all our lives. Oh, give it up, my boy, and save your brother. My Sidney, my baby-boy, why did you not come, to bid me a last farewell?"

The door opened and two men entered, bearing a lifeless body. One glance, and the dying woman recognized her younger son. The death-damp was on her brow but her voice seemed to have gained a supernatural power. "Oh yes, you have brought him at last," she shrieked. "My Sidney, my beautiful boy. Bring him to his mother, let me kiss that marble brow. Oh God! is this the baby, who was so fond of playing drunkard? Merciful heaven, pity the drunkard! Oh Sidney, speak but one word to your dying mother! No—he is dead. Oh, God! how terrible!"

After passionately pressing kisses after kisses on the cold cheek, she sank back—dead. It was all over. Mother and son were before the great Judge.

Shortly after Chester and his sister left the tavern, Sidney drank deeply, became enraged at the bar-keeper, who drew his pistol and inflicted fatal wounds. The heartless wretches brought the body to the poor mother, thus overflowing her cup of grief.

It is the day of the funeral. Lucie and Chester stand behind the coffin of the broken-hearted mother and the ruined brother. After one long remorseful look at the handsome face of his dead brother, Chester Cary sank on his knees, his whole frame trembling. Lucie knelt beside him and put her arms around him.

"Lucie, do you think God will forgive me?"

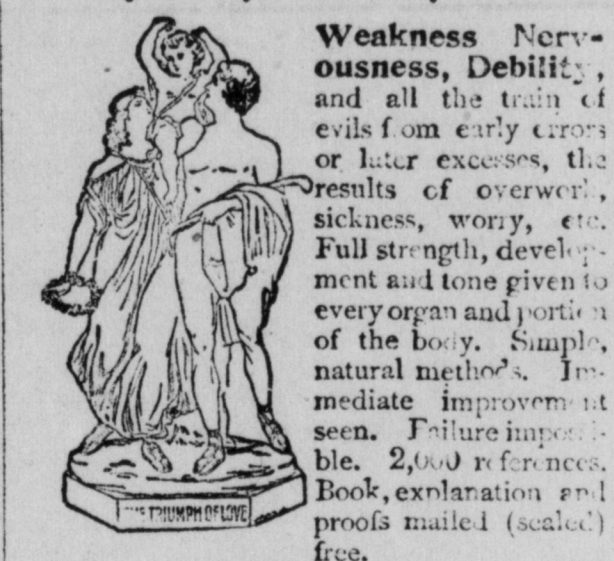

"O my darling brother, he is more than willing! Let us pray together."

From that hour Chester Cary was a changed man. The day that brought him to the age of majority he celebrated by organizing a temperance society, which today stands a pillar in the temperance world. He has earned for his sister a cozy little home. Not a drop of wine is allowed inside of the gate, and Lucie now in her twenty-third year, is happy in caring for her brother. It is rumored that she is soon to leave the home of her brother, for one of her own. Wherever she is, she can never forget the sad fate of father, mother and brother; but God in his goodness will still be her guide. His angels will never depart from her side.—Southern Journal.
