Bill and Polly.

By D. V. Lucas, D. D.

Ah! poor Frank, some of us understand it for you. How often have you heard it said of someone, "Do you know he is just one of the best fellows that ever lived, if it wasn't for that one thing?"

Certainly—a large social element in his make-up. Very fond of friends; would die to save a friend. A big heart; would put himself a long way out to do you a kindness; would far rather suffer anything than hurt the feelings of a companion.

By easy steps, without foreseeing the harm, he has got into a wrong social world. The biggest gun in his fort has been seized by the drink traffic and the drink habit, and made to do damage to its owner.

Well, my poor Bill, by-and-bye, lost his place. Could get nothing to do. Polly and the little girl wouldn't eat when they could, because they felt so badly. They could do nothing but cry. Now, they could not eat if they would, for a good part of the time there is nothing in the house. They don't cry much now; they have become somewhat hardened to it. There are a good many others like them. Their mill has ceased to grind for them any comforts and only a very little of the actual necessities of life. The devil's mills still go round, grinding up as so much useless ore husbands and sons, and swallowing up in their bottomless hoppers whatever little gold may be found in the pockets of their victims.

It is proposed to stop, by a vote of the people, this iniquitous and disgraceful traffic in the bodies and souls of men. Some one says, nay, many say, "If you do, you will ruin business in your town." Who says it? Not the sober industrious teetotaler. I never knew such a one to cry out "You will ruin business if you close the grog shops." Even if he should think that such might be the case, he would more likely say, "If something must be ruined, let us the rather ruin business than the bodies and souls of our neighbors."

Let us see how far such predictions have any foundation in sober thought and intelligent reasoning.

The story is told of a witty temperance advocate delivering a stirring address on the question which lay so near his heart, when there was thrown, by a loyal representative of the whiskey business, an egg, which, as it was said, must have been laid by a very sick hen. The missile struck the worthy orator fair in the face. What do you think he did? Why, he took out his handkerchief and wiped away the foam, and said: "I have always maintained that the arguments of our opponents were exceedingly rotten." Well, I fancy that the more you consider the foundation upon which the whole whiskey fabric rests, the more you will be convinced of the truth of the orator's remark.

From the centre to the circumference, from the top to the bottom, you will find the arguments of the friends of whiskey as rotten as the materials from which very much of their goods is made.

Let us look for a little at this one: "You will ruin business if you stop the sale of liquor."

Do you see, standing on either side of me, two men? Shut your eyes if you can't see them without. The one on my right is well dressed. He has a suit of the best of tweed, a silk hat and umbrella, and a gold watch. He is a traveller for the firm of Brown & Tomkins, at $1,500 a year. The man on my left has a pair of old throw-away shoes, out of which his toes are sticking. He has no socks, a pair of pants which for patches are a regular crazy quilt, a shirt with no front and no collar. He is minus a vest, with a coat to match the rest of his garments, and a hat he picked up in a back yard. It is my friend Bill; come down to this by regular process. A graduate with honors from the school of Bung. I see at the other end of the room, all on one seat, the bootmaker, the butcher, the merchant tailor, the hatter, the draper and the photographer. To this group of men, representing the useful and honorable trades in our town, I say: "Gentlemen, you see these two men standing by me? To which of them do you extend an invitation to visit your places of business?"

"To which? Why, to the one on your right, of course."

"To the one on my right you say; and why, gentlemen, to him?"

"Because he looks as if he might sometimes want a pair of boots, or a roast of meat, or a suit of clothes and a new watch, and he looks as if he has the money to pay for them."

(To be Continued.)

DOES DRINK MAKE MURDER?

Facts Which Show That Murders by Drunkards are Unpremeditated.

England is discussing the statement of a well-known physician of Liverpool, that murder is largely due to drunkenness. He says the number of instances of murder would be reduced by one-half if the evil of drinking to excess could be stamped out. Many men, he says, who commit this fearful crime are peaceable enough in their rational moments, but seem to undergo a perversion of nature as soon as their minds are confused and excited by liquor.

The testimony of all physicians who have made a careful study of the effects of drinking on the brain goes to show that liquor does not, as so often erroneously stated, "bring out a man's true nature." The doctrine of "in vino veritas" is not sound. Some men, it is true, only excite their natural propensities by over-indulgence.

A naturally garrulous man will often be so acted upon by the drink that his garrulosity is increased tenfold. He will talk until he is absolutely powerless to speak further. A man of solemn temperament will usually be moved to tears. A man of belligerent tendencies will defy the world to mortal combat when in his cups. A man of poetic fancies will rival Milton in his imaginative eloquence.

In support of the English doctor's theory many instances have been cited from the police records and the "family histories" of murderers have been closely examined. The result is a powerful argument for temperance. In seventy-five cases out of a hundred it has been found that men who have committed an apparently uncalculated or unprovoked murder have been quiet and well-behaved citizens in their sober moments, but had been drinking to excess just before committing the crime. In the other cases the crimes could be attributed to some set motive. The motive which largely predominated was robbery.

An analysis of the cases in which drunkenness has preceded the commission of murder seems to show that an excessive use of liquor produces a condition of nervous tensility. The drinker, no matter what his previous and normal temperament may have been, suddenly grows excessively irritable. He is annoyed to the pitch of desperation by trivial causes.

In an insignificant remark he detects an insult. The playful banter of a companion is interpreted as serious hostility. A friendly slap on the back is regarded as a challenging blow. The inflamed mind, like the law, has no room for trifles. Everything is magnified. A slowness to obey on the part of one who is accustomed to obey is construed as a defiance of authority.

In fact the drinker pays no heed whatever to the probable results of his violent acts. Whatever the fancied cause of his sudden wrath may be, it turns him into a frenzied beast.

While under this fearful influence he has been known to kick his wife in the breast and stomach until she dies (a by no means infrequent case), to beat his mother to death, cut the throats of his children, to gouge out the eyes of a companion. Such acts do not constitute murder in the sense that murder is a crime involving premeditation. It is no doubt true that in very many instances of the sort the unfortunate person had no idea whatever of committing a murder two minutes before the violent act was accomplished.

A case which illustrates the force of the proposition that murder is due often to drink occurred some months ago in England. It is only one of thousands of similar cases that have occurred in this country but is especially interesting from the fact that the judge in his charge to the jury lamented the many cases on the calendar which were plainly due to intemperance.

The prisoner was a militia man, who had just been discharged from his annual training. The victim was a domestic servant, to whom he had been paying attention, and whom he had treated with the greatest kindness up to the day of the murder. On that day the prisoner, the deceased and others were drinking together. One of the company, a married woman, let fall out of her pocket a razor, which she had kept to prevent her husband doing harm to himself or any one else.

The prisoner picked it up and put it in his pocket, saying that he would take care of it for fear of danger. Later, the prisoner, who had pawned his coat to pay for more liquor, became annoyed because the servant refused to come downstairs when he called her, and, going up, he forced open the door, dragged her downstairs and cut her throat with the razor.

The medical evidence showed that the man had been in a frenzy of excitement when the murder was done. There were two cuts, penetrating to the spine, severing all the large vessels and causing almost instantaneous death.

K. D. C. imparts strength to the whole system.

"Tell me—when you were in the army, were you cool in the hour of danger?" she asked. "Cool? I actually shivered," he replied.
