LAST OF AN OLD RACE.

THE COCOPAH INDIANS OF THE LOWER CALIFORNIA.

Evidence That What is Now an Arid Region Was in the Dim Past a Magnificently Fertile Country—Ruins of a Temple Buried in Sand.

It is a strange, wild region, that strip of desert, 100 miles wide by 300 long, lying between the Sierra Madre Mountains on the west and the Colorado river and Gulf of California on the east, and locked in the granite bosoms of the sun baked hills or buried in its unfathomable sands is the history of a certain stage of civilization that flourished there before the Pilgrims gained a foothold on Plymouth Rock. Now it is nothing but a treeless, trackless, waterless waste of sand and barren mountains, a gruesome level of gray death, whose mysteries are being slowly solved by a few hardy prospectors.

Not many weeks since, two prospectors arrived in San Diego, Cal., from an isolated part of the Cocopah Desert, says a correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, and reported having found a ruined temple half buried in the sand. To support their story they brought in pieces of ancient pottery and stone carvings, on which the tracings followed no pattern known to man. According to their statement, the ruins above the sand consisted of immense cylindrical stone columns arranged in the form of a parallelogram, covering an area of 265 by 400 feet. On the east side was a group of columns, which they concluded must have been the entrance. Here they shoveled away the sand and uncovered a broad flight of stone steps. The columns at the entrance were in a modified form of a letter S, and carved to represent huge rattlesnakes. The entire inclosure was filled with drifting sand, only the ends of the columns showing above the surface. Near by was a huge stone image of a turtle. Two exploring parties have tried to reach the find, but each has been driven back; once by the intolerable heat and thirst, and again by a terrible sandstorm.

There arrived in San Diego recently three prospectors. Two were Mexicans—Jose Rodriguez and Juan Romero. The name of the third was not learned. He remained in the city but two days and then returned to the desert. His name is not known to his two companions, but they know that he is an American. From the two Mexicans, who are above the average of their class in intelligence, it was learned that he is a man with a history, conversant with the traditions of the Cocopah Indians, who are probably the remnants of the lost civilization which once inhabited that desolate region, and to which their descendants still cling, in preference to the fruitful country on this side of the mountains. The Mexicans knew that he had been with the Indians for years, but had not inquired into his history. He was met by the first American with a past who was trying to forget it among the naked, unlettered children of the desert that they had known. On this trip they had been joined by the stranger, who volunteered to show them some valuable mineral property with the understanding that they were to share equally in the results, he to accompany them to this city, where they were to conduct negotiations for the sale of the property or enlist capital in its development. It was on this trip that he told them his history.

He said that he had lived among the Cocopah Indians for nearly thirty years. When a good-sized boy he crossed the plains with his parents in an immigrant train. While stopping at Fort Yuma he had gone bathing in the river and had been seized by the Indians, carried away and held captive by them for years. It was years before he learned why they held him. He was never ill-treated, and was always given the best in the camp, and on long marches his captors would deny themselves food and water in order that he might not suffer. As he grew to manhood, he learned that some tattoo marks, which had been pricked upon his breast and arms by his father, corresponded with a tradition of the Cocopahs that a great calamity would befall them if he was allowed to depart before a certain time. Finally, as he became reconciled, the surveillance was somewhat relaxed, though he always understood that any attempt on his part to leave the tribe would be met with violence. When he had grown to be a man he had no desire to go away, in fact he had become one of them in dress, manner and speech. The chief men were greatly pleased at this and chose for him a wife from one of the highest families in the tribe. It was from his wife's great grandmother, who had been nearly 100 years ago the wife of a renowned chief, that he learned more of the tradition.

She told him that many years ago, long before she or her father or her grandfather was born, there was a tradition that a man marked as he was in fact he had come from the south and visited them. Then they had fields, orchards, cattle and cities. This was long before the coming of the padres, ages before the stranger, after learning all about them, had departed, but returned with a great many warriors, laid waste their fields, orchards and gardens, destroyed their cities, killed all the men who did not escape into the mountains, and carried off the women and girls. Then one of the wisest old men cautioned the small remnant of the tribe to watch for a man with marks on his skin similar to those of the chief from the south, and when found he should be held captive for so many moons; then the dead Cocopahs would rest easy and the living prosper. If allowed to depart the lands of the tribe would again be invaded and no one left to tell the story. This tradition had been handed down for generations and when the little white boy, latching in the yellow waters of the Colorado nearly thirty years before, was seen by several Cocopahs to bear the marks, for which they had been watching and waiting for centuries, they carried him to their desert fastnesses. The old squaw said there was a big stone turtle in the Santa Catarina Valley with the whole history of the invasion, massacre and the wise man's warning written on the rock on which the turtle rests. Less than a year ago old Jose, chief of the Cocopahs, told him that the period of danger had been passed and that he might go. But the white man had a family, and did not care to leave. Since that time he has been over the greater part of the desert prospecting.

The Mexicans brought in some very rich specimens of gold ore and various crystals, including topaz, garnet and carnelian, which they claimed to have discovered, probably with the aid of their strange partner, about twenty miles below the American line, and evidently in the vicinity of the foothills of the Cocopah Mountains. In fact, all evidence tending to show an ancient civilization has been found in that locality. They also say that at or near where the gold rock was discovered they found several old tools of a very crude and ancient pattern concealed among the rocks. Near by were the ruins of an old adobe building and inside, underneath the rubbish, they unearthed an old, musty, Latin prayer book. In the opinion of the prospectors the old building is the remains of an early mission or a branch of the Santa Catarina Mission, posted in a section more accessible to the Indian settlements of that day and near the spot where the Indians mined gold. They also say that they found several old tools of a very crude and ancient pattern concealed among the rocks. Those who have heard the Mexicans' story generally believe it. They are two unlettered prospectors, incapable of romancing, except as to a possible gold find. A tale like that of the tattoo marks is beyond the scope of their imagination. Then, again, other prospectors have met the stranger and, while knowing he was a white man did not question him as to his strange life. There is a stone image of a huge turtle in the Santa Catarina Valley. It weighs many tons, but whether carved by human hands or nature has never been fully established, though the preponderance of the testimony of those who have seen it is that it is the work of man. There is said to be another near the ruined temple, discovered by the two prospectors months ago. They say the latter must weigh several hundred tons, and is a finely carved image of the "genus chelonina." This, taken with the fact that the columns of the ruined temple were carved to represent rattlesnakes, would indicate that the lost race that once inhabited those now arid and sterile plains and mountains defied reptiles. Again, it is said that there are palm trees in the Canyada de las Palmas beside which the famous old mission palms of San Diego would appear as shrubs.

The Cocopah Indians have many traditions as to the origin of these orchards and stone images; too many, in fact, for newspaper story; but they have no records, nothing beyond legends, which are like old nursery tales. The Cocopahs may be descendants of that fertile race, the few remaining are tall, clean-limbed, thin-flanked, deep-chested and broad-shouldered; as a rule, generous and superstitious to an unusual degree, but absolutely without physical fear of anything earthly. They have their rancherias and a few cattle. After the spring overflow of the Colorado into New River they follow the receding waters of the latter stream, planting corn and mesquite beans, and in six months their crop is fit for harvesting. This is practical evidence of the fertility of that soil and is additional confirmation of the belief that what is now a scene of desolation was once a magnificent reach of orchards and gardens densely populated. Scientists and archaeologists have never penetrated that region. It is many weary, trackless miles off a palace car route and the only maps of the locality are seared on the brains of a few hardy prospectors, the victims of modern civilization.

Epigrams of History. The Leisure Hour offered prizes for wise sayings connected with historical events. The editor awards the first and second prizes, both of which are won by women.

He says: "A careful analysis proves beyond all doubt that the most popular instances of wise sayings connected with history are the following:

"Oliver Cromwell's—'Put your trust in God, but keep your powder dry.'"

"Cardinal Wolsey's dying words—'Had I but served my God as diligently as I have served my king, he would not have given me over in my gray hairs!'"

"Laitimer to Ridley at the stake—'We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust, shall never be put out.'"

"Sir Robert Walpole in the declaration of the war with Spain—'They may ring their bells now, but they will soon be wringing their hands.'"

"Nelson's—'England expects every man to do his duty.'"

"Wolfe at the Heights of Abraham, repeating the stanzas of Gray's Elegy—'I had rather be the author of that poem than take Quebec.'"

"Sir Walter Raleigh at his execution—'What matter how the dead lie, so that the heart be right?'"

A Lawyer's Will. Sir James Fitzjames Stephen was a great lawyer; but he has left a very little will. The exact text of it is this: "This is my last will. I give all my property to my wife, whom I appoint my sole executrix." How the family solicitor would have embellished this simple statement of a simple testamentary intention most of us can easily conjecture. "Will" would have become "will and testament," property would have become "real and personal estate" at least; and there would have been a long rhapsody about revoking "all previous wills and codicils." It is gratifying to have such conclusive evidence of the true value of the elaborate legal phraseology which is engendered at a charge of so much a folio to the lawyer's client.—London Daily Graphic.

The Advantages of Church-Going. "I have found during my stay here," said a stranger in the city, "great enjoyment in my church-going. They are all new to me, and I go to a different one every Sunday, and sometimes to two a day. I see a great variety of churches, many of the elaborate legal phraseology which is engendered at a charge of so much a folio to the lawyer's client.—London Daily Graphic.

How to strike a Fair Average. Expect every man to do his duty and with all your expectations expect to be disappointed.—Galveston News.
