obstacles in our way, but we must learn to obey the command of scripture, and life. "Gather out the stones." We are liable to discouragement in any good work we may undertake, but it seems that such is the intangible nature of the work in which we are engaged that discouragement is very apt to overtake us. Perseverance must be our watchword. There is still a great work for the Sons of Temperance, or other body of the same nature; to do.' The Temperance people of this Dominion will nave to unite on some political action sooner or later, and the bond of union will have to be found in some orgauization or institution. Discouraging days have often come to those who have undertaken great enterprises. Cyrus Field in giving his account of the Atlantic telegraph, says, "It has been a long and hard struggle. Nearly thirteen years of anxious watching and ceaseless toil. Often has my heart been ready to sink. Many times when wandering in the forests of Newfoundland in the pelting rain, or on the deck of ships, on dark, stormy nights, cused myself of madness and folly to sacrifice the peace of my family, and all the hopes of life, for what might prove after all, but a dream. I have seen my companions one after another fall by my side, and feared I, too, might not live to see the end. And yet one hope has led me on; and I have prayed that I might not taste of death till this work was ac. complished. That prayer is answered; and now, beyond all acknowledgments to men is the feeling of gratitude to Almighty God."

Breathern in this noble cause of tem perance and prohibition we must labor on, plod on, and although many discour agements may come upon us, and difficulties beset our path, yet we must persevere and pray that we may live to see the day when the traffic in strong drink shall be stopped.

Come, lalor on: The laborers are few, the field is wide, New stations must be filled and blanks supplied; From voices distant, far or near at home. The call is "Come."

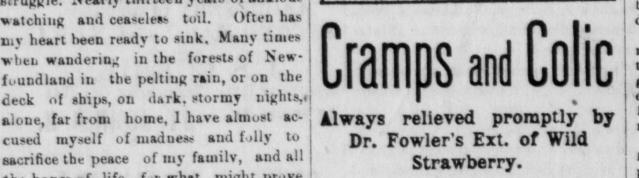

Come, labor on: The enemy is watching, night and day, To sow the tares, to snatch the seed away, While we in sleep our duty have forgot, Excursion tickets to the Great Far at He slumbered not.

Come, labor on:

She (furiously)-How dare you? Do you not see that it is you who have ruined me?

[The carriage reaches its destination; the bride and the bridegroom step out smiling; and receive the congratulations of their assembled friends. "Happy man!" say the men; "Lucky girl!" cry the women, and everybody is agreed that the parents of the bride are "clever."] woman is quite content to be the "famous He (despairingly) You have ruined my Mrs Smith." while her husband is simply "Mr. Smith, the husband of the brilliant Mrs. Smith.' If Mr Smith is satisfied to have this so, why need the rest of us make comment? But Mr. Smith, is not always satisfied, and that is why we comment and many times credit Mr Smith rebellion to the arrant imperiousness of man Poor Mr Smith! He rather deserves our sympathy He is a little proud. you know; has a good position, which he has made for himself in the world, and love, you know, is dependent upon a good | as good." Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cure many things for life, and not the least of these on the part of the proud man is a certain little tactful flattery on the part of the woman he has asked to share his lot If you call this selfishness and arrogance, then set it down to that, but remember all the while that men have ever been so, and the most of us would not change it all if we could My Atlantic Monthly friend mentions Mary Shelley and Elizabeth Barrett Browning as the happy wives of talented men and wisely mentions them as exceptions. These were truly ideal marriages, but it was the intellectual and not the domestic life that formed the ideal.

There have been other happy unions of men and women whose tastes and aspirations ran along harmoniously in the same grooves, but these, too, must be noted as exceptional They certainly do not belong to the commonplace, else we would not cite them.

Let me tell you a funny little story. At least it is funny now, because both the people concerned in it are young and the honeymoon is not so long past, that they have grown indifferent to the small triffes that worry each other every day.

Mr. Benedict is an immensely clever fellow He looks well to his business affairs and writes stories and poems that meet with ready acceptance. Now little Mrs. Benedict has discovered that a literary man's wife has woes She has been thinking a good deal about this discovery of late, and one evening not long since she read some of Mr Benedict's stories and poems and cried She did not cry because the writings were in a particularly doleful strain, but she cried because-well, she told Mr. Benedict the "because" after dinner, and she reserved her tears until that moment too

"You are not writing them to me," she sobbed. "You love, or you have loved. some other woman.

Poor Benedict did what he could to comfort her He declared that she was the only woman he had ever loved or ever would love and finally wound up vowing he would never write another line.

Now, about Mr. Benedict's heart affairs I do not know, but I do know that he will write many more lines; that he can no more refrain from putting on paper his rare and charming thoughts than a bird can cease from flying until its wings are broken, and I am glad of it It should take more than a woman's whim to kill a man's ambition But never fear; genius is immortal It may sometimes be stifled. but it can never be killed.

I do hope that dear little Mrs Benedict will put by her childishness and praise the and moems that the clever
