That is Scrotula. No disease is older

9

No disease is really responsible fo larger mortality.

Consumption is commonly its outgrowth. There is no excuse for neglecting it, it makes its presence known by so many signs, such as glandular tumors, cutaneous eruptions, inflamed eyelids, sore ears, rickets, catarrh, wasting and general debility.

Children of J: W. McGinn, Woodstock, Ont., had scrotula sores so had they could not attend school for three months. When different kinds of medicines had been used to no purpose whatever, these sufferers were cured, according to Mr. McGinn's voluntary testimonial, by Hood's Sarsaparilla which has effected the most wonderful, radical and permanent sures of scrofula in old and young.

"Can you tell me the name of the girl in grey?" he asked, as they took their places at luncheon.

The woman whom he addressed directed a languid plance down the long table in the direction indicated, and said ind ffer eutly, "I don't quite see which you mean."

"The one with a face like a saint and a halo of grev feather trimming round it." he answered. His words seemed irreverent, but his tone expressed admiration. and the brown eyes looking into his dark. ened with annoyance.

"That is Estelle Beaulieu," she said briefly, and busied herself taking off her gloves.

"Estelle." he murmured under his breath, "it reminded me of her, yet I hardly thought-do you know that it is five years since I met her last. Mrs. Dameril?" he added more loudly.

"Is it?" Mrs. Dameril's tone expressed only a pointe interest.

"Yes, it must be five years this month. Just about the same time since I saw you one. Many people are too blind or too apathetic or too cowardly to take it."

"I fancy I should seize it if it came to me," said Mrs. Dameril, quickly, "but women have fewer chances than men. I am sure. In what way would success command your admiration for a woman?"

"In many ways. There is the gift of song, of dramatic nower, the success of look were directed toward the girl in grey. the artist, the anthonses. Take now, for instance, this book that everyone is talk. ing of. I heard of "The Vision of Life" as soon as I landed: I read it in the train coming up; I have listened to discussion and good wishes, concerning it at every dinner party I have been to since. If the writer is a woman. as rumor says, she is worthy of all admiration, for she has written a book that is meet her."

"Would admiration include love?"

"Not necessarily, but in her case, most probably I should say. I am half in love with her already," he added, smiling. The strength expressed in his features and figure, both well-formed, straight and vigorous, was at its best when he smiled, revealing the capacity for tenderness and humor that often goes with strong natures.

For a moment Mrf. Dameril was silent; | tumult of supreme astonishment. her whole mind absorbed with a problem that had suddenly presented itself to her. Had the chance for which she had waited so long come at last, and should she, through cowardice, shrink from taking advantage of it? There were intricacies and subtleties to be thought out; but surely these could wait for her later consideration.

Whether success or failure lay in the acceptance, the solution could be summed up in these words: "I love you and I did ness, lunch is over. If you are going to t for the sake of winning your love. You, at least, cannot blame me."

Mr. Basing had returned to the contemplation of his plate when she looked up;

There was a burst of enthuiasm as they all rose to the toast, and every voice and those who were near enough leaning forward to shake bands with ber, and each vying with the other to express the most appropriate sentiment of congratulation

> He waited till the clamor was abating, and then, still looking at her, formed with his lips one word-her name-"Estelle," and raised his glass and it was not until they had resumed their seats that the rememberance of what had immediately preceded this revelation occurred to him. He turned to Mrs. Dameril with an unspoken question, in a

Her eyes were full of stormy passion and her face was very pale.

"I told you that you were the inspiration of that book," she said, mockingly. "It will be easy for you to find out now whether I spoke the truth or not."

"But," he said, bewildered, "you did know then? I thought you meant-" "I meant to put you to a test," she interrupted. "I don't think you have come out of it very well. Thank goodsmoke with the rest I am afraid I cannot wait for you. We must postpone our

the Commission before re-instatement.

We were all staying down at Folkestone. Do you remember? and as a matter of fact she and I quarrelled. By the bye, you were the indirect cause of our difference of opinion, too."

"Really?" Mrs. Dameril had been looking at him attentively, but her long lashes swept over her eyes now; or he would have seen that there was no surprise in them, only a gleam of triumphant pleasure.

He was still occupied with his reminiscences, and went on happily.

"You and I were both staying with the Halwards, I recollect, and used to ride and whate together. She took it into her head we were very great friends, and one day she accused me of saying something uncomplimentary about her to you. I told her she must have misunderstood you, and then she got vexed and wouldn't listen to to any explanation. It was the day before I returned to town, and a month after that I went abroad."

"So suddenly that you couldn't find time to say good-bye to any of your old friends," said Mrs. Demeril ironically.

"Did I not?" he queried. "That was very remise of me. What a lot has happened since then. I had not even heard of your marriage, and now you are a widow."

"But you and Estelle never did get on very well," she remarked. "She was too high-flown and effervescent for you. She was all purpose and theory, and you were all practical energy. To be reciprocal to you; a woman should have a calm and placid nature; something on which, in your tired moments, you can lean."

She spoke with a quiet, smooth accent, and Mr. Godfrey Basing looked at her for the first time with real attention. The low, soothing voice harmonized well with the repose and refinement of correctly handsome features; there was an air of essential equanimity about her bearing, and it was only at odd moments that the brown eyes negatived this when their alcopy softness flashed suddenly into impetuoue life.

"Perhaps you are right," he said, while a touch of sentiment crept into his tone. and for a moment their mutual glance met.

"She is handsomer than she used to be," he reflected, "and even more sympathetic.

"He is beginning to remember," thought Mrs. Dameril "my influence ought to be stronger now. I know my power, and I away?" "Is it about yourself or me?" he asked, owering his voice to the level of hers. "About me entirely."

"Then I promise." His interest did not seem to be overpowering; she felt a little nettled. "Will you feel less bored when I tell you that I know who wrote The Vision of Life'?"

"And you will introduce me to her?" He was quite eager now.

"There is no need, you know her already." He could not mistake the significance of her tone.

"Bertha-ie it really you?"

Quite unconsciously he had used her Christain name: the formality of their reacquaintance was forgotten; he had gone back to the old days.

Her face lit up, and her eyes were dangerous as she said, in a sort of breath. less way, "Do you remember what you said just now?"

"That I was half in love with her already? I meant it."

"It was for you she wrote it, Godfrey. You inspired her with the dreams she wove into that book."

"Bertha_"

"Hush! You must tell no one, remem. ber. You promised. I had not meant to acknowledge it even to you, but the temptation was too great. I shall have to leave directly after luncheon, because I am driving out into the country to call on some friends. If you cared to drive with me-"

"Of course I care. Good heavens! surely we are not going to have a speech." The conversation had ceased, and everyone was looking at the host, who, stand. ing up at the head of the table, was clearing his throat ominously.

There was nothing stereotyped about these Sunday luncheons at the great publisher's house, and the company, including the most distinguished of Bohemiane in various walks of art were prepared for unconventionality.

"Mr. Pritchard is as successful at speaking as he is at publishing," whispered Mr. Dameril. "He is sure to be amusing." "Ladies and gentlemen," said Mr. Pritchard, "I want to propose a health to the other ladies before he had time to reply, and by the time he reached the draw. ing room, ten minutes later, she was gone. The two thoughts that possessed her softly, "will you promise never to give it mind were anger at her failure in the very moment when success seemed certain, and relief that a retreat, however lame, had been possible to her.

> Meanwhile Godfrey had made his way to Estelle, and was saying to her :

> "Am I still in disgrace, or have you forgiven me after all these years?"

> "I forgave you long ago," she answered. "I found that I have been unjust to you. The fault was on my side really, and it is my turn to ask pardon now." "And to think that it was you who wrote that book," he went on. "Wil you let me tell you some time all I felt as I read it? I can scarcely believe that it is you who have accomplished so much. Do you remember how I used to scold you for wasting your time and your talents?"

would be the ruin of me; you used to say that you would dispise me in the future for not doing what I had it in me to. That was how I first came to write. You made : me so angry and so hurt that I wanted to do anything to make you in the wrong." "Then you cared what I thought?" He longed to hear from her lips the confession that her look had already made to him.

"You did not hate me for an interfering and conceited fool that I was?" "I never hated you."

"It was all a mistake then-our quar rel?"

"All a mistake. If you had written me one line of good-bye. I would have written and told you so. As it was, I wrote my book instead."

"What a blessed chance it was, my coming here to-day," he said irrelevantly. "You met another friend," Estella said gravely. "What did Mrs. Dameril say to you? Did you like her as much as ever!"

"Did I ever like her?" he echoed. " don't know; I never thought about it:" "You seemed very glad to meet her again."

"Was I? I think that I am rather sorry that I did. But it does not matter either way, Estella when can I talk to you? May I see you home? Will you walk [Cr. Chase's Ointment across the park with me?" "If you really would like it."

Have Great Faith in Diamond Dyes."

To the wise woman who buys good material, Diamond Dyes are a necessity to the economy of the household, and by using these dyes many perplexing problems are solved. It is here that good judgement and management can save much, while the thoughtless and extravagant keep themselves hopelessly poor.

Mrs. G. S. Pook, Prince Albert, N. W. T., says: "I am very pleased with the success I have had with Diamond Dyes. I have used the Black for Wool on many occasions, and always got a lovely fast black that kept its bright and full color as long as the goods held together. I dyed a heliotrope cashmere dress for my little girl; it took a rich Cardinal, very even in color, and that stands washing. I have great faith in Diamond Dyes."
