

MISCELLANEOUS.

TIT FOR TAT.—Ye maun ken that the folks in Glasky, and indeed in maist o' the towns in Scotland, leeve in what they ca' FLATS, whilk intends that ae family leeves on ae floor, and anither on the story abune, reversing the order o' the Englsders, for wi' you the puir folk aye leeve id the cellars, wi' us in the garrets. Weel sir, ye maun ken that my name's Margaret M'Milligan, that I leeve in a braw street in Glasky, ca'd the Trougate; weel, abune us there leeved a Mistress M'Vittie, wha' bein the wife o' a seafarin man, and haeing nae family, took to readin' Watty Scott's novvells. Well, I being a kind o' lane woman mysel, thinks I, I'll just send up to Mistress M'Vittie, and ax the len o' ane o' the buiks, no that I was varra anxious about readin' the buiks; but juist that I might say I had seen them, gif ony body ax'd me. Weel, Mistress M'Vittie sent down, thro' the medium o' her servant, to say that she wadne put hersel' in the power of the leeberry, by len'ing the buiks; but, if I wad tak' the trooble to walk up the stair, I might hae the readin' o' the buiks as lang's I likit. Weel, weel, thinks I, I'll e'en pocket the affront, but deil has me if I dinna retaliate the first opportunity. Weel, in about a towmond or sae, the lady's husband cam' hame, and it bein' the summer time, the fire was unco' laigh, and as there was to be a dinner, they wanted bellis, sae the queansent down, thro' the medium of her servant, to ax me if I would len' her my bellis. Gude be praised, thinks I, here's a grand opportunity! gang yer wa's, says I to the servant, and say that I dinna find it convenient to len' the bellis just noo; but if she wad tak' the trooble to walk down the stair, she might hae the leeberty o' blawin' as lang's she likit. Hopin' ye'll excuus the liberty I hae tain in writin' to ye, I am, sir, yours faithfully,
MARGARET M'MILLIGAN.

A RUN-AWAY WIFE.—A placard is on the walls of Canton, in which a missing frail one's attire and person are most minutely described. The lady's name was Lan-peang, she was twenty years of age, had a 'melon-formed white face,' was decked with 'precious strong hair pins, silver, gold washed, foreign flowered, pearl-set ear-rings, precious stone bracelets,' &c. On the 15th of the moon she rose early, and, having been reproved by her lord and master at breakfast, she started off at noon, and has never since returned. 'Any good person,' says the placard, 'who will give information where she is to be found will be rewarded with ten dollars, and any one who will bring her back will receive forty large dollars, and no questions asked.'—Letter from China.

REPUBLICANISM.—Never did mortal hold the noblesse in such utter detestation as did the DIRECTEUR Sieyes. "Whenever I meet a stranger," says he, I ask him this question—"Are you my equal?" should he reply to the negative—"Then you are a wolf," I rejoyn, "and as a wolf I will treat you." In the year 1796, a certain Abbe Poule, a fanatic contrived to gain possession into Sieyes's house, discharged a pistol at the latter's head, but missed his aim: upon which the republican, nowise flurried at his narrow and almost miraculous escape, coolly turning to his housekeeper, said aloud, "Should the Abbe Poule call here again, you will have the goodness to say I am not at home."

The Shah of Persia has just published a collection of his poems. It bears the following title:—"The poems of him, before whom the world humbles itself to adore him."

A ROYAL PUN.—Mrs. Baddeley was very popular in her day, for the harmonizing sweetness of her person and voice; unhappily, she was always distinguished for some imprudences in her conduct. A royal personage was very much pleased with her, to whom the latter circumstance being mentioned, "Well, well," said he, with a generosity that always characterised him, "she may have performed 'Badly' in private, but in public she is very good indeed."—Bernard's Retrospections.

ROYAL BON-MOT.—A heavy heeled cavalry officer, at one of the Brighton balls, astounded the room by the peculiar impressiveness of his dancing. A circle of affrighted ladies fluttered over to the prince, and inquired by what possibility they could escape being trampled out of the world by this formidable performer. "Nothing can be done," said the prince, "since the war is over: then, he might have been sent back to America, as a republication of the stamp act."—Croly's Memoirs of George the Fourth.
