THE PENSION LIST.

An Old Apologue Newly Applied.

'Tis, I confess, a bore exceeding,
That people of high birth and breeding,—
The Porcelain of this life, while we,
God help us, are but Crockery.—
Should, when they condescend to take
A pension—just for taking's sake,
(Like Filch, who ne'er on trifles standing,
Took anything, to keep his hand in,)
Be all shown up, both great and little,
By that remorseless Daniel Whittle;
That all the gold and silver fishes
Which, in their reservoir delicious
The Pension List, now frisk about,
Should, one by one, be angled out,
A hook in every high-bred snout,
And served, with Harvey sauce, so neat up,
For horrid Radicals to eat up!

'Tis shocking: and I know but one
Sure method such a doom to shun;
Which—as I'm now in moral vein—
I'll thus, by apologue, explain.

A learned Sheikh had once some wine,
Which people thought extremely fine:
Whether 'twas Shiraz or Rosoli,
I blush to say I'm ignorant wholly;
Suffice it that historians say
'Twas of 'la premiere qualite.'

This wine he kept in a huge bottle,
Which had a long, slim, narrow throatle;
And, one night—in his cups, no doubt—
Happening to leave the stopper out,
A thirsty snake, genteel and thin,
Finding the passage free, slipp'd in;
And, as the wine was, to his thinking,
Capital stuff, set hard to drinking,
And vow'd since, Him of Paradise,
No snake had e'er had birth so nice.

So far, so good, but morn now came,
And the snug snake, no more the same
Slim gentleman who slid inside,
Had swell'd so large that, when he tried
His passage back, 'twas all in vain,
The rogue could not get out again;
But there was fix'd, for folks to see,
A bottle curiosity,
At which men gape, and with a stare,
Ask, 'how the devil it got there?'

But what did he, who own'd the nectar,
Say, when he saw that Bottle Spectre?
Poor, injur'd owner, what said he,
On finding this arch-enemy
With his choice wine so fattened up,
That scarce he'd stand another sup,
And though, in such high-fed condition,
Look'd much ashamed of his position,
'Knave!' quoth the Sheikh, 'one act alone
Can for this slippery trick atone,
Or from that show-box you set free,
Where now you writhe so awkwardly,
And make of you—if aught could make—
A decent and an honest snake.
Disgorge this instant, all you've had;
Refund what's not your own, my lad;
And then, once more erect and thin,
Slide out as slim as you slipp'd in.'

LONDON TIMES.—The Irish Tithe Bill.—If we comprehend exactly the cause of Mr Stanley's secession from the cabinet, it was that the right Hon. gentleman insisted on the retention in the Irish Tithe Bill of that clause which confined the application of every shilling of the church revenue exclusively to the uses of the establishment itself. The bill therefore is now in that state to which the remaining part of the cabinet—that is to say, the anti-Stanley portion of it, was desirous that a bill should be reduced. But if Mr Stanley was dissatisfied with that form of proceeding, if he insisted on having a bond against any alienation of any possible surplus, a fortiori, we presume, will the Conservative parties, both in the Commons and the Lords, be eager to restore the bill to that state in which it stood prior to Mr Stanley's resignation. It appears to us, therefore, that the form which the proceedings on this great question are about to take will be a motion of the high church party—1st, in the Commons for the reinstatement of the appropriation clause—a motion of which it requires no gift of prophesy to predict the decided rejection, and by a large majority; 2d, after the bill shall have been sent to the House of Lords, and in the proper stage (if it should ever arrive at that stage)—viz., the committee—a motion will no doubt be made to tie up the question of alienation of church property, and, as surely as such a motion shall be made, so surely will the installation madness carry it against the ministry of Earl Grey. That clause, then, forming a portion of the bill, it will be sent back to the House of Commons, and again rejected. What follows! The bill must be lost. There is an end for this year (God knows for how many more years) if any peaceful, legal, deliberate reform of the Church of Ireland by a commutation of tithe! What becomes in that case of the Irish Protestant clergy! Famine, or another million! What of the public tranquility! All—all hope of it—extinct; and this is the work of Conservatives! We must come back to the subject, which is fearful as it is inexhaustible. Never have we known a condition of public affairs more pregnant with matter of melancholy foreboding.

LONDON ATLAS.—The Opposition.—We have heard that there was a meeting of the Conservative Club on Wednesday evening, at which it was resolved to enter upon a more decided course of opposition to the present government than the Tory party have hitherto considered it prudent to adopt, confiding to Sir Robert Peel the onerous office of leading the new movement in the House of Commons. Sir Robert is said to have declared that the time was at hand when the new ministry must be formed, and that it therefore became imperatively necessary to demonstrate the strength of the opposition. In accepting the leadership, he wished to be left free to the exercise of his own discretion, and not to be fettered by unnecessary interference. It is expected that the occasion of the discussion of the Irish Tithe Bill to-morrow (Monday) night will afford the desired opportunity for the hon. baronet to assume his new position.

It may not be considered unnecessary to inquire upon what grounds Sir Robert Peel has arrived at the opinion that the time for a new ministry has arrived; and, granting the hypothesis, by what process of reasoning has he succeeded in convincing himself that the time for Tory ascendancy is approaching! Sir Robert and his party appear to have committed two great political errors—firstly, in assuming the insecurity of the present ministry; secondly, in to themselves the triumph of succession. There never was a moment when the administration was more firmly knit together, or when it possessed more completely the confidence of all honest men; and even if it were not so, there never was a moment when the Tory party were less likely to be troubled with the labours of the government.

The administration has made great efforts for the public good; it has succeeded in tranquillizing Ireland, which was left on his hands, a legacy of discord, by its predecessors; it has given to the kingdom the advantages of a purified franchise, and a reformed representation; it has struggled for truth against a spirit of resistance that was not confined to those whose principles it opposed, but that occasionally warped the judgment of those whose interests it promoted; it has opened the doors of inquiry upon every great question of public moment; it has set in motion a variety of plans of improvement, which time and its own energies will mature into practical benefits; it has revised the system of poor laws, which, under former governments, was permitted to grow up into rank luxuriance, and which was rapidly diffusing vice of the worst kinds amongst the lower orders, to the manifest injury of the industrious classes; it has declared the great principle of tithe appropriation, amidst a clamour of interests which a Tory government would have sunk before, and which no other government could have successfully combated; and it has effected more extensive retrenchments in the public expenditure than the most ardent economist
