Gregwan Cas Gregwan Cormea to expend the following itemed in the last century is about to take place in this country without any very extraorfirst mighty tribute which circumstances will pay to civililization. Bravery has its admrers, and ever will, and the doer of daring deeds will still command the world's homage; but Anthony Simpson to expend the following arms themselves, according to the Duke of sums-401 for the Road on the North side of Wellington, in his most instructive Despatches, Cocagne River, and to complete the Bridge most be content to borrow victery from money, have out voted them. The apathy which sat most from Cocagne River to the Tibedo Setmost fortunately, this country must, for the tlement. 151 for the Road and Bridges lead-present and hereafter, be ruled. A nation of symptoms of returning energy; and so tangible ments demand the application of original principles, while they reject the ordinary mode of narrow expediency and deception. In a word the barometer to which our statesmen must refer takes the form of the public purse; and the party to govern is the party who can keep that full. Even in less commercial times, the state of the finance in all nations, regulated the nature and security of the government; but, in our times, the very existence of social order depends exclusively on the capacity of the government to pay. The finest theory of statesmanship, when slightly divested of needs less ornament, is, after all, but an affair, like that of Panglos's pupil, of £. s. d.,—pounds, shillings, and pence; and it is, therefore, that we look with confidence, for the social changes that we want, not to Whigs er Tories, 'the we look with confidence, for the social changes that we want, not to Whigs or Tories, 'the ballot box' or the 'five points', but to a deficient revenue. Pressing partisans may be put off, moral arguments rejected, and sophistry introduced as a substitute for argument, but the unsatisfied creditor is a fatal visitant which preludes ruin. It is with states as with individuals in the present the states as with individuals in the states as with individuals. duals: inability to pay is a tacit confession of impotence, and of comparative degradation. The time has passed when finesse was finance. The Chanceller of the Exchequer has acknow-ledged two things: the improbability of further economy, and an impossibility, under existing arrangements, of raising adequate revenue. A new adjustment was required by existing circumstances, and he recommended the increase of Custom's duties by a partial destruction of certain monopolies. The principal monopolies enumerated were sugar, timber, and

The first important item in the Ministerial budget was impeached on Friday week, in the House of Commons, by a resolution moved by Lord Sandon. A debate ensued almost unexampled in its duration, for it continued throughout the week, and now stands adjourned to this evening. This protracted debate, howe-ever, derives its immediate interest, not from any merit in the discussion, but in reference to the probable consequences expected to fol-low from it, as far as the two great parties in parliament are concerned. The arguments pro and con have been almost totally neglected in the general impatience to know the result of the pending discussion; and, although it is ex-pected, with positive certainty, that Ministers will be in a minority, still, there is a disincli-nation to anticipate the course they may in consequence adopt until the event itself is as-certained. to the probable consequences expected to fol-

Their opponents, recognising an adverse virtue in the public, are full of apprehension that they will risk a second and even a third defeat; that is, defeats on sugar, timber, and corn, in the assurance that, in the discussion which must prove the second and second se corn, in the assurance that, in the discussion which must precede minorities, they will be scattering abroad, in the honest mind of England, a healthy stimulant at fatal enmity with Tory triumph. Without pretending to the favour of any particular political revelation, we have reason for thinking, that, up to this moment, Ministers have not decided on the course they may ultimately pursue. There is one party always, in a state like ours, to whom great delicacy and deference is due; and the present condition of public business may be another consideration in the sum of motives another consideration in the sum of motives that may be most argent. There seems no very pressing occasion to interrupt the present on, and it is settled, we suspect, in the Tory camp, that Sir Robert Peel's immediate admission to office would not be followed by a general election before Autumn. For similar reasons, the Whigs may not, though they decline to resign, think it necessary to one more appeal to the country before July or

If Ministers fail to act wisely in the present emergency, it will not be for deficiency in the number of voluntary advisers; and although there is security in the aggregate of counsellors perhaps they could not, under all the circumtances, do better than adopt the course which the instinctive apprehension of the enemy has so impredently pointed out. Further and still more ample discussion will discover to the country the real views and sentiments of the Tories, and then in the very ripeness of argument, will be the time to give them an apportunity of trying their hands at Cabinet-

The whigs, no matter what their motives, selfish or otherwise, have done well in making their financial disclosures; but it is a question whether, under all circumstances, they shou'd rest content with what they have done, and leave further ulterior measures to those who have out voted them. The apathy which sat
