would have a weekly communication with each other. The contract had not yet been signed, but was in a forward state of preparation.

In reply to an observation from Mr Hume,
The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that, in coass quence of certain matters connection, ted with the original contract, ap intimation was given to Messrs Cunard, that they would have the preference if the whole arrangements ontemplated were carried out.

Mr M. Gibson thought that no preference

Mr M. Gibson thought that no preference should be given to any party; the matter should be open to competition. He called on the government not to give a monopoly to the Halifax and Boston company, but to give a share of their patrosage to the Great Western, or any other company that was in a position to perform the necessary duty.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, in 1833 it was publicly offered by the government to contract for increasing the means of communication between England and North America, and the tender of Messrs Cunard was taken. It was then contemplated to have a weekly communication, but a fortnightly one was found to be sufficient at the time. It had since been found that increased communication was been found that increased communication was necessary, and the government consequently felt themselves bound to give Messrs Cunard the preference of taking the contract for providing the means for that communication.

Lord J. Russell did not know the terms of the existing contract with Messrs Cunard. He believed that it had been well performed, but he thought it would be right to lay before Par-liament papers stating how efficiently or other-wise it was performed, before a new one was wise it was performed, before a new one was entered into or signed.

Mr M. Gibson hoped that the contract would not be signed until the papers moved for by the hon, member for Bristol on the subject were laid before the house.

Sir R. Peel (as we understood) was not prepared to give any such assurance.

It is a well-known (act, that at least three or four steam ships for the above service are at the present time in rapid course of construction, by the same builders and engineers who built the Cambries and characteristics. by the same builders and engineers who built the Cambria, and other steam ships of the British and North American Royal Mail Steam Packet company; and there is not, in the minds of practical men here, the shadow of a doubt that, under the same management, the performances of these additional steam ships will be equally creditable, not only to the parties engaged, but to the government and the country at large—not leaving out of sight the incalculable benefits arising therefrom to the commercial communities of America and England, and, indeed, to the world.
