Communications.

A MODEL WIFE.

A fair Correspondent has furnished us with the following sketch of 'Model Wife.' We have not the least doubt that the author is herself a perfect specimen of the character she has so graphically describes, and we are in hopes that the picture she has given of what wives should be, will induce many of our fair readers to imitate so worthy a character as the 'Model Wife,' and by such means contribute largely to the domestic comforts of many a poor Benedict.

She does not expect a continuance of those polite attentions practised before marriage, but remains entirely unchanged herself. She turns a silk dress three times lest she should hurt the feelings of her husband by asking for 'change' to buy a new one. She acquires the art of brushing broad cloth, and of folding up masculine apparel, which she carefully picks up when thrown on the floor or across the back of a chair, and puts it away in its proper place. She is careful to have the dinner ready at the time appointed, and not to grumble if she has to wait two or three hours afterwards. She takes it for granted that her husband is 'short of cash' and does not suspect him of saying anything but the truth, when he affirms such to be the case.

She knows how to scold in the kitchen and then to appear in the parlour with a serene countenance, and lips decked with a contented smile.

She never complains that children are troublesome, or gets tired of nursing.

She never wants to leave home for change of air or scene. If she finds out that the bosom of one of the best shirts is sullied with a few ink spots, she quietly takes them out again, and says nothing about it.

If the baby makes too much noise, she takes it into another apartment lest it should discompose the nerves of its father.

She never forgets the favorite words, 'honour and obey,' taking them in their literal sense, and not as a figure of speech.

She never presumes to have any opinions of her own and far less to express them, being always willing to admit the superior sense and better judgment of her husband. When he goes out to spend a social hour with a friend or on private business, she never asks where he is going, or enquires when he will be home, but sits up till twelve to see that the room is kept warm, brings the slippers to the fire, near which she places an arm chair, prepares something nice for supper, receives him with a cheerful smile, does not complain of being sleepy, or of having been left alone.

She is constantly employed, keeps everything in perfect order, never complains that she has too much to do, and acknowledges at the same time, that her husband is the true source of everything good about the house, and that she indebted to his advice and direction for every arrangement which is conducive to the comfort of the family.

She does not require the escort of her husband, except on rare occasions, and is not too fond of riding or walking.

The above is liable to the cordial review of Mr. Editor, also to any additions, corrections, &c., which may proceed from his more practised pen—he is requested to know nothing of the writer, who is too much engaged with cares incidental to model wives, to admit of any other than a hurried use of the Pen.

Reprieves under the gallows are generally hailed with satisfaction, and the same may be said of which beyond all doubt has relieved many from almost equally sure deaths by long complaints. Mr. Fowle, the general agent, who deals in the article largely, sends us the following note, which he has just received in the way of his business.—Chronotype.

Irassourgh, Vermont, May 5, 1847.

Dear Sir: I am nearly out of the Balsam of Wild Cherry. You may forward, if you please, two or three dozens more. The medicine gives better satisfaction here in pulmonary complaints than any other that I have kept. I have tried it with perfect satisfaction myself—having been troubled with a severe cough for more than a year; and having procured various popular remedies without material benefit—at length I tried Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry, and before I had finished the
