

Seat of the Muses.

FOR THE TELEGRAPH.

A FAVOURITE NEW SONG.

WITH thee all the hardships of life I could bear, And brave the attacks of misfortune and care;
But care and misfortune my mind would subdue, If the friend of my heart must partake of it too.

Had fate in its bounty propitiously lent Enough but to furnish the cot of content, The dictates of love in that cot I'd pursue,
For the friend of my heart would partake of it too.

But AGNES with nought but her truth to endear—With nothing to give to distress but a tear; Will ne'er look for comfort with ruin in view,
And the friend of her heart to partake of it too.

From the Portland Gazette.

BALLARD STANZAS.

I KNEW by the smoke, that so gracefully curl'd Above the green elms, that a cottage was near,
And I said, "If there's peace to be found in the world, "A heart that was humble might hope for it here!"
It was noon, and on flowers that languish'd around, In silence repos'd the voluptuous bee; Every leaf was at rest, and I heard not a sound But the wood-pecker tapping the hollow beech-tree.
And "Here in this lone little wood," I exclaim'd,
"With a maid who was lovely to soul and to eye,
"Who would blush when I prais'd her, and weep when I blam'd, "How blest could I live, and how calm could I die!"
"By the shade of yon summit, whose red berry dips "In the gulf of the fountain how sweet to recline, "And to know that I sigh'd upon innocent lips,
"Which had never been sigh'd on by any but mine!"

REFLECTIONS ON MARRIAGE.

THERE is nothing of so great importance to us, as the good qualities of one to whom we join ourselves for life; they do not only make our present state agreeable, but often determine our happiness to all eternity. Where the choice is left to friends, the chief point under consideration is an estate.— Where the parties choose for themselves, their thoughts turn most upon the person. They have both their reasons. The first would procure many conveniences and pleasures of life to the party whose interests they espouse; and at the same time may hope that the wealth of their friend will turn to their own credit and advantage. The others are preparing for themselves a perpetual feast. A good person does not only raise but continue love, and breeds a secret pleasure and complacency in the beholder.

I should prefer a woman that is agreeable in my own eyes and not deformed in that of the world, to a celebrated beauty. If you marry one remarkably beautiful, you must have a violent passion for her or you have not the proper taste of her charms: and if you have such a passion for her, it is odds but it would be imbibed with fears and jealousies.

Good nature and evenness of temper will give you an easy companion for life; virtue and good sense, an agreeable friend; love and constancy, a good wife or husband. Where we meet one person with all these accomplishments, we find a hundred without any one of them. The world, notwithstanding, is more intent on equipages and all the showy parts of life; we love rather to dazzle the multitude, than consult our proper interest; and it is one of the most unaccountable passions of human nature, that we are at greater pains to appear easy and happy to others, than really to make ourselves so. Of all disparities, that in humour makes the most unhappy marriages, yet scarce enters into our thoughts at the contracting of them.
Several that are in this respect unequally yoked, and uneasy for life, with a person of a particular character, might have been pleased and happy with a person of a contrary one, notwithstanding they are both perhaps equally virtuous and laudable in their kind.

Before marriage we cannot be too inquisitive and discerning in the faults of the person beloved, nor after it too dim-sighted and superficial. However perfect and accomplished the person appears to you at a distance, you will find many blemishes and imperfections in her humour, upon a more intimate acquaintance, which you never discerned, or perhaps never suspected. Here, therefore, discretion and good nature are to shew their strength; the first will hinder your thoughts from dwelling on what is disagreeable, the other will raise in you all the tenderness of compassion and humanity, and by degrees soften those very imperfections into beauties.

Marriage enlarges the scene of our happiness and miseries; a marriage of love is pleasant; a marriage of interest easy; and a marriage where both meet, happy. A happy marriage has in it all the pleasures of friendship, all the enjoyments of sense and reason, and indeed all the sweets of life. Nothing is a greater mark of a degenerate and vicious age, than the common ridicule which passes on this state of life. It is, indeed, only happy in those who can look down with scorn or neglect on the impiety of the times, and tread the paths of life together in a constant uniform course of virtue.

THE PUNISHMENT OF VICE, AND THE REWARD OF VIRTUE.

DURING the recital of the account given by Mr. Morley of that unfortunate wretch, the countenances of every one betoken'd surprise and satisfaction, all, except the three witnesses, who, at this unexpected discovery of their guilt were so confounded, that they confessed the whole affair.
They were tried and condemned, the two who were concerned in the murder to death, and the carrier to be transported for life.

The feelings of Mr. Mason at this attestation of his innocence are not to be expressed; every one crowded to congratulate him, and the Judge also expressed his satisfaction at the event. Mr. Mason was instantly liberated, and left the court with Mr.
Morley. "Oh," cried he, addressing this worthy man, "but for the interposition of Heaven, and your goodness, a shameful death would have been my portion! Never can I express all that my heart dictates; but before I offer you any proofs of my gratitude, let us hasten to my beloved Serina, whom I left in the deepest affliction."

As soon as she saw her father she sprung to embrace him, but fearing to ask what was his doom, she stood in trembling silence. "Dispel every fear my Serina," said he, "I am honourably acquitted, and free to leave this dismal abode."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed she, whilst the most rapturous joy sparkled in her eyes, "are we indeed released from every apprehension? Then Heaven be praised, for I have nothing more to wish! Oh, with what emotions have I waited your return! Every step I heard I fancied was your's, and then the dread of what might be your lot made my heart sink with apprehension.—Let us go instantly from this horrid place, where we have passed so many hours of sorrow. Our peaceful home will appear, if possible ten times sweeter than before."

Mr. Morley congratulated her upon her father's release, and then, having nothing more to detain them, they left the prison. As they proceeded to Mr. Mason's house, he informed his daughter of all that had passed on his trial, and how much they were indebted to Mr. Morley. "Next to Heaven," said he, "I consider him as my deliverer, and you must assist me to prove my gratitude; yet never can I recompence him as I could wish."

"I ask no recompence," said Mr. Morley, "the pleasure of being instrumental to your happiness is a sufficient reward. I have before said, pleasure is best received when it flows from the joy of others.
To receive it thus is my highest delight; and when I see my fellow creatures smiling around me, every wish of my heart is gratified. I detest the narrow soul which would live only for itself. No; let me from my large store distribute to others, let me as far as I can, mitigate the calamities of life, and I shall possess as much happiness as reason can defire."

Mr. Mason and Serina were again reinstated in their peaceful abode, and the remembrance of their past sorrows gradually wore away; or was remembered only to convince them, that however to the partial sight of mortals the wicked may for a while appear successful, it is only to make their fall more dreadful, and to convince mankind, that Heaven, though sometimes slow in its judgments, will at last guide the rod of vengeance, and point against the wicked the arrows of destruction.

The good, the virtuous, the philanthropic Mr.
Morley, whose life was a continued series of benevolent actions, released the officer before mentioned, and his family, from prison, and enabled them to provide for themselves in an honest manner.

He continued not long in that neighbourhood, but eager to dispense the riches he possessed, to mitigate the sorrows of others, and to befriend the friendless, he travelled from place to place, "Where'er mankind and misery are found," beloved, esteemed, and revered by all who knew him; happy in the constant enjoyment of an approving conscience, and crowned with the favour and blessing of Heaven.
