

I expect to be beyond the border of the hereafter, to be a traveller in the great Perhaps, and what do I care now? What I have to be sorry for I am glad of it. I am alone, friendless, forsaken, dejected, sorrowful, hunted, hated, disgraced, disowned and dishonored; and for why! because it is my business to provide entertainment to as many as possible, to add a little zest to the sleep-producing contents that from month to month the editors set before you. I have endeavoured to make you popular, I have been laying corner stones for the mighty structure of your future happiness. In my employ I have 140 students sworn to secrecy and solemnly pledged to reveal and report with variations all deeds and conversations. And you,—you who hate me so thoroughly—if you could look through my office, and see the volumes of De Oms that in my kindness I have suppressed, you would be loud in my praises. There are untold deeds and words; revelations that would startle you. But there, I am done and I am undone. “Meantime I seek no sympathies, nor need.”

A long and interesting program had been prepared and was most successfully carried out. The first event was a game of ball between the Old Ladies' Home team and the Thomas-Duffy aggregation. The Old Ladies were captained by Miss Parks, and Miss Elliott pitched, while for the T. Ds Miss Knight was captain and pitcher. The game was very close and exciting, and after a hard struggle was won for the T. Ds by their captain who brought the earthly existence of the ball to a sudden stop by sitting on it when the T. Ds were one run ahead.

Special mention should be made of Miss Dobson who caught for the Old Ladies in a way which showed the results of careful training by an old Cape Breton player.

After this, a list of track events was run off. One of the best events was the hurdles. In this Miss Parks, who had been trained by Joe Wood, was the favorite, but a surprise was furnished by Miss Weyman, who refused to come in second. After a close race the two finished tie, far ahead of the others. The mile run was another close race between Misses Weyman and Knight, who both showed the effects of long walks on the track in the past. The result was another tie,
