Familiarity.

Sweet maiden, let no stranger arm
About your waist be thrown;
Before you give such liberty
He should be better known.

Be not so eager to be swung
Within the mazy dance
As not to care whose arms you're in
So long as he wears pants.

For all you know, he lately came
From out a beer saloon,
Where in the midst of many fools
He was the chief buffoon.

For all you know, he walked last night
Adown a darksome street
With a girl on his arm whom you would scorn,
In the drawing room to meet.

You do not know but that the kiss
That set your cheeks aflame
Was given before, with equal warmth,
To a woman of tarnished name.

Did it ever yet dawn on your innocent mind
That a man may wear a mask;
That he soon may cease to value the gift
For which he has but to ask?

Then be careful, fair maiden, and do not throw
Your pearls before the swine;
Remember the world has a jealous eye,
And catches the tiniest sign

Of a woman departing from Virtue's path
But a man may do as he please;
Her failings are heralded far and wide—
His errors are sunk in the seas.
—Henry Harvey Stuart.

Fraternal insurance has grown to such proportions that we no longer comprehend it. The figures do not help; they hinder. It is no longer a little shower here and there, but a slow dripping rain over the continent. It is the spread of a new gospel of glad tidings. It takes in the poor. It does not leave out the rich. It meets the wants of the young men in his beginnings. It fits into the sturdy demands of trade. It is the protection of children; the stay of youth; the strength of middle life. It receives little by little; it hoards its treasures it gives back in bulk when most needed. Protecting the home, it beautifies it. It is the highest honor the world has paid to woman.—Ex.
