The Value of a High School and College Education

Every once in a while there appears in the press the statement by some self-made man, who usually worships his Maker, that the education obtained in the High Schools and Colleges is of no value. If this be true, then our work is useless and our labour vain.

Recently this idea has been advanced by no less a person than the great electrician and inventor, Edison.

Edison, of course, is a genius, and rules that govern ordinary persons do not apply to a genius.

But while Edison's opinion with regard to electricity may not be questioned, it does not follow that his views on education are necessarily sound.
