A HENPECKED HUSBAND.

Mary was Choking and He Went for the Doctor.

"Run for the doctor, quick! Mary's choking."

'Twas Thursday night, and everybody knows what a night it was—drizzly, foggy, cold and mud!—don't mention it. I was settled before the fire for the evening, smoking my second love—my meerschaum—when that excited sentence of my wife burst on my ears.

Mary is our domestic—a good girl, but rather rash and domineering at times. All the resolves of my better half are "By Mary," and I knew there was no use to argue the question; I hustled into my rubbers and macintosh, and went for the doctor. He was out! I had a premonition of it—my luck always served me so—but being better acquainted with my wife than I was upon a former occasion, I knew that to go home without a doctor was to lose my peace of mind for some time. I saw a medical friend in a hotel and coaxed him out in the rain, knowing all the time that our girl would have to be pretty sick when we arrived to satisfy him for the good company he had left.

Imagine my surprise when I ushered my capture to our second flat to find my dear wife comfortable in my vacated chair; the baby was snoozing peacefully, and Mrs. Smith, our next door neighbor, had evidently brought her fancy work for a two hours' chat.

"How's Mary?" I gasped, as the doctor glared at me.

"Oh, how do you do doctor, won't you come in. Mary's asleep, James. Poor girl, she has had such a bad cold for two days that I thought she was choking tonight; she coughed so."

The doctor refused to go in—he said good night, and there has been a decided coolness on his part since that evening.

"Did you get very wet, James?" and as I refused to answer she continued to her friend, "You know Lottie, that ever since Tuesday Mary has had such a cold. She was out in the fog and rain looking after the clothes and got so wet. How did you make out with yours?"

"Why, I got mine done Rough Dry at Ungar's," laughed Mrs. Smith. "They only charge 25 cents a dozen, and it is such a convenience when it rains."

"James!" said my wife. "Mary shall not wash another week. I will send it all to Ungar's. Do you understand?"

"Yes, my dear. She will not do any more washing" was my reply—"and no more choking," I added under my breath.—Advt.

PICKLES.

ON HIS SPRING TOUR.

The Representative of J. C. Ayer & Co. and His Business.

J. C. Ayer & Co's representative, Mr. George Gregg, dropped into PROGRESS office last Saturday afternoon, looking as young as ever, and as fresh as if he had just finished a ten instead of a thousand mile drive. It is hardly necessary to say that Ayer's Canadian business is large and requires looking after. They have no better field than the maritime provinces, and Mr. Gregg looks after the advertising and the agencies in that section. He has been in the business a long time, and while publishers esteem him for his squareness, they know him to be as sharp on a bargain as any of their patrons. He does not pay any more for advertising than it is worth. His visits are as regular as the spring tide, and the patrons of Ayer are always glad to welcome him.

Ayer & Co. is one of the largest advertisers in the world, and know as much about it as long experience can teach them. It is a striking and complimentary fact to the weekly newspaper that they have entirely deserted the daily paper, and are confining their advertising to the weeklies. PROGRESS has nothing to complain of in this respect, for its contract with Ayer this year is for seven inches instead of four. The advertiser appreciates the paper and the paper appreciates the advertiser, not only for the lack of captious complaints, but for their invariable promptness in meeting their obligations. Mr. Gregg started, Wednesday, behind his handsome bays for Fredericton, whence he will cross to Chatham and other northern points, following the shore to Nova Scotia around to Cape Breton and down to Halifax.

SHE TURNED UP HER NOSE.

Disdain That Spoiled an Artist's Study in Delmonico's.

That man's intentions in staring at a pretty woman can be greatly misunderstood had good proof, according to a story told by a lady at the opera. In a restaurant on Fifth avenue the room was pretty well deserted save for the presence of an unaccompanied girl eating toast and tea at one table and a good looking young man dissecting a canvas back duck at another.

When the young man had demolished his bird he sat back in his chair, and for the first time his gaze fell upon the girl eating toast. An expression of evident interest sprang into his face, and he fixed his eyes upon the girl's countenance and studied it with an avidity that was observable to the waiters standing about, and was not lost upon the young lady herself.

After a moment she summoned a waiter and informed him that she wished to move to another table out of range of the innocent man's vision. While in the process of doing this the cause of her discomfiture seemed to suddenly realize that he had annoyed her, and when she shot a look of disdain upon him he was sure of it. He quickly drew a card from his pocket and scribbled something on the back of it. Then, paying his check, and getting into his overcoat, he walked directly over to the young lady's table and placed the card before her.

"It is your duty," said he, "to read that card. You have no right to consider yourself insulted when you have not been in the least."

Without waiting for a reply the gentleman left the room. After waiting a few moments the girl caught up the card and read it. It bore the name of one of the best painters in the country, and the writing upon it was as follows:

"I have been looking for a perfect nose for nearly a year without success. My last picture needs one badly. As I looked up suddenly from my duck your nose was sharply outlined against the window pane. If you have suddenly come upon the object for which your heart has longed through many months, you will be able to imagine my sensations when I discovered your nose. I scrutinized it long enough to make a vivid mental note of it. But I am forced to say that it is better in its natural form than when turned up in disdain."

The girl crushed the card between her fingers and carefully put it in her portemonnaie. Then she dashed out of the restaurant. "And it Julia encounters that artist again in her travels," said the narrator, "I am inclined to think that he will be master of the situation."—Clara Belle in Philadelphia Press.
