THE WORLD OF BOOKS.

A New Anthology.

This is a period fruitful of anthologies, a class of books for which we have a partiality, upon the supposition that a nosegay is often preferable to the whole garden. But the business of making them is in danger of being injuriously overdone; while the importance of quality is overlooked all sorts of nascent muses, and some whom we fear would have been the death of the whole nine, by the recitation of a stanza, are rushing to the fore; so that Helicon, which was once a clear and almost inaccessible fountain, has now become a turbid valley flood, rushing to the confusion of us all. But we doubt if this outbreathing of the time-spirit can be restrained, till, like all things mundane, it has run its course and subsided into its own proper oblivion. Here is a volume* artistically fine in all its accessories of paper, print, and binding, and as capacious and pretentious as the compilation of Bryant or of Duyckink; yet how inferior and how different in more essential matters! It is extremely faulty in its very design, for the editor proposes to make a poetaster's paradise, and admit any who has ever rhymed, if he can pay for the privilege. The result of this must be the revolt of every man of literary taste and judgment who takes the book into his hands. Added to this is the deforming of the volume by many badly-executed portrait value. Robinson, of Moncton, following the excellent example set by his elder brother the week before last, took unto himself a bride last Friday. The lady was Miss Harrison, sister of the pastor of the First Baptist church. The wedding was a very quiet one, and the young people followed the sensible modern fashion of dispensing with a wedding trip.

Miss Campbell returned on Monday from a fortnight's visit to St. John.

Mr. and Mrs. Bliss Ward returned on Monday from a fortnight's trip to New York, having enjoyed their holidays immensely.

Mr. Will Cook, of Springhill, spent a few days at volume by many badly-executed portrait plates; some of them from subjects unprepossessing in appearance. If elegant bindng, indeed, with calendered paper, gilded edges, beautiful embossed design, and lines supposable as poetry till one reads them, are all that should be desired in a book, then this may justify its existence; but from any other standpoint this is a curious literary monstrosity. It is not to be denied that if the waste and draff had been cast out, the book would have substantial value, as well as attractive beauty, for there is contained in it a body of verse, some good, and some excellent, the leading American poets being represented, and some Canadians; but side by side with these, having similar biographies and undiscriminative praises and recommendations, and with portraits, are alleged poets whose productions would have been excinded by the editor of a country newspaper, had he a particle of taste. Surely this marks something like the lowest stage of intellectual democracy; and to say that it fails by the lack of a rigorous editorship is to understate the case, since thing indescriminately placed; so that while Apollo moves with shining grace, and while Apollo moves with shining grace, and properly it is not edited at all, but everysings, on one page, Scraggs halts dismally and Noggs hobbles screechingly on the other. The editor, as it aware of such possible exception, remarks as follows in his preface: "Any one who derides the local press and its bevy of embryo writers, whether they be deserving of censure or not, stamps himself to be a narrow-minded person, with a brain of rather small calibre." The "local press" is not here concerned; nor do we deride any thing of promise or reality. The bruised reed in literature would we not break, nor would we put our foot on the palest, sickliest flower that ever had life in it; even the clever artifice would we spare, for the art's sake, much as we prefer nature. But this furnishes no reason for fostering and accrediting literature like this, with neither art nor nature to recommend it. Vanity and pretension ought no more to pass unquestioned in letters than in life and character; and when gray-headed men and women come forward with creaking lines, which are prose, and as such, nothing, the editor of such a work as this purports to be should know his duty and fulfil it. Against this mingling of incongruous matter we enter a protest. No man who can barely whittle a button for the garden gate to the ship railway. presumes to be an artist in wood; I think the carver and guilders might complain. Nor does he who has drawn a rudely laughable caricature on the big barn door, rush madly for Harper, as a new artist. Men have sense everywhere else; but multitudes if they have a little nascent sentiment, and have managed to chime some words together, go suddenly into a strange condition of unreason, proposing to invade the worlds of art and song to take them at once by storm. There is no such singular vanity as this, which, without any proper worth, hungers for a world's applause. But is it the proper function of the editor to render such chimeras substantial, if that could be, or to minister to a vanity so profitless and injurious to all possessed by it? Of course all metremongers will buy the book delighted, and the pleasantest pages will be the ones on which their claims are acknowledged; but every writer of merit will revolt from such classification. Books of such a character as the one before us can but work evil; for what is the proper purpose of a good anthology but the guidance of the public taste and judgment, but the exhibition of their best who have done worthily, securing at the same time that part of their proper reward which consists in the appreciation of their fellows.

The editor of this book may not be willing to admit the conclusion, but so it appears to us, that the result of his labors must be, the cultivation of illusions and phantasms in minds which are in need of clearing, the debauchery of public taste, confusion of public judgment, and the discredit and defiance of all true critical standards. By general admission, the person is highly reprehensible who obliterates moral landmarks, who labors to confuse the sense the uncertain may have of right and wrong; but is not he also open to censure who ignorantly or willfully breaks down the distinction between the true and false, the praiseworthy and the contemptible, in literature, and brings the product of poet and critic into conwe have our abiding place among mists and shadows. Only the consolation of weeks.

Oct. 8 .- We are all of us on our very best behavior just now, on account of the influx of ministers caused by the meeting of the Presbyterian Synod in Monc-ton. In almost every house there is a minister, and in some houses there are two or three, so piety instead of gaiety rules in the railway town this week. Nearly all the pulpits in town were occupied last Sunday by visiting Presbyterian ministers, except St. Bernard's and St. George's.

Speaking of St. Bernard's reminds me that a most attractive feature of the service in that church last Sunday was the singing of Mrs. Lear, of Boston, who delighted those present with her beautiful voice. This accomplished musician has kindly consented to assist at the promenade concert to be held this evening by the ladies of St. Bernard's. Miss Hamilton, of Amherst, and Mrs. J. G. O'Doherty will also assist. It is to be regretted that the Balmoral Choir has fixed upon the same evening for its entertainment, as the congregation of St. Bernard's are most anxious to raise sufficient funds continue the work on the interior of the new church during the winter.

These were some of the old favorites but they have been supplanted by the "Pansy" and "Chatterbox" stories, "Little Lord Fauntleroy," and "Five Little Peppers." The Old fashioned pills and pyhsics have been surperseded, and wisely, too, by Pierce's Purgative Pellets, a mild and harmless and effective cathartic. They are pleasant to take—so gentle in their action that the most delicate child can take them, yet so effective that they will cure the most obstinate cases of constipation,
