IS REVENGE. SWEET By J. Fitzgerald Molloy,

Author of "How Came He Dead ?" "That Villain Romeo." "A Modern Magician," &

[NOW FIRST PUBLISHED. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.]

CHAPTER XXXII.—(Concluded.)

"And you are ready to believe the slanders of a wicked world," she cried out.

10

"I believe what my own experience has shown me to be true. You pretended to love me, that I might become the dupe of your accomplice, you lured me on and deceived me so long as I had money to lose at the gambling-table in your house; when my gold was gone an end came to your affection, and you threatened to acquaint your husband with my advances. I came to England to see you and Capt. Fother-gille, and demand the sum which I lost to who had watched him from behind the curyou both Death has snatched him from me, but you remain, and from you I shall exact your share in that sum, four thousand pounds.

"This is preposterous; it is sheer madness." she cried, her face no longer beaming with smiles but frowning in defiance. "You played and lost your money; you have no right to reclaim it now."

"I lost it because I know now I was duped. Fothergille was a cheat, who had been turned out of every gambling hell in Germany before I met him. He and you robbed me as much as it you stole the money from out of my pocket," he said, raising and gesticulating violently.

"It is false; I have never cheated she answered.

"Never. Not even when you played with young Lord Herrick, whose uncle forced you to return your winnings under threat of exposure?" said the baron.

Mrs. Crayworth's face assumed a look of terror. "That is another slander," she replied, "a base slander on a helpless woman.

"You were not helpless then. Your husband and Fothergille your accomplice were living, why did you not call on them to defend you?'

"Have you come here to injure me," she said in a quiet tone.

"I have come to ask you for your share of the spoils-four thousand pounds. I am now poor, and I demand the money stolen of me by you. The world has taught me the value of gold."

"Even if this were true, I am unable to meet your demands."

"I don't believe it; if this house is not yours it is your aunt's, get the cash from her," he said. "I want it at once."

"I cannot; she would not give me a penny. I haven't it, believe me." I must have it: it is mine, and I shall she had labored and schemed seemed crumbling beneath her feet. There was no triend to whom she could turn for help, protection, or sympathy. Worse of all, she dared not look into her own heart.

CHAPTER XXXIII.-REUNITED.

On arriving at Paddington station, Sir Danvers impatiently jumped into a hansom, and was driven to that quiet street near Hanover Square where his wife had taken refuge. He had scarcely rung at the door replied. tains of her dining-room, immediately rushed to answer his summons, guessing who her visitor was, and the purpose of his coming.

"Lady Fothergille within," he asked, nervously.

"Yes, sir, will you please to step inside." the landlady replied, leading the way upstairs and ushering him into the drawing-room.

He looked round the apartment quickly, and telt disappointed at finding it empty. "She will be here presently, sir," Mrs.

Simmons explained as she vanished. In another minute the door opened and Ethel stood before her husband. He rushed forward and clasped her in his "My dearest," he said, "can you forgive me. It was my great love for you I must have been mad when I spoke to you as I did, when I doubted your love and loyalty for one moment."

"It is I, Danvers, who have to ask forgiveness. My pride was hurt by your house and lett her. On regaining her doubts of me, my anger was roused be- reason she came to believe the dreadful more for her in the future than she could cause you would not listen to me. scene she witnessed was merely a dream, but Humiliated by your words I held my peace from what you have told me I know it must when I could readily have explained and have been real." set your je alousy at rest. You had roused my spirit, and I wickedly determined you should suffer if only for a little while. But forgive me."

"The joy of meeting you again and being certain of your love recompenses me for my pain. You cannot tell, Ethel, how thought I had lost you," he said with a vers."

heavy sigh. "You should never have thought it," she morrow."

PROGRESS, SATURDAY, JULY 11, 1891.

into her face, and she threw her arms round her husbands neck. Instinctively she the sooner to catch the sounds she exher husbands neck. Instinctively she knew what a blow this charge against a pected, quite regardless of the invalid. kinsman must be to one who was the soul of honor, how keenly his righteous pride must feel this foul slur cast upon his house, and immediately recognised it as her duty to comfort him in his affliction.

"My dear Danvers," she said, gently, "I am grieved that this pain should have fallen on you; but every family has its black sheep; nothing can dim the bright-ness of your personal honor."

Understanding her desire to soothe him, he bent down and kissed her.

to me so long as you are near me," he

"And after all the charge may be false," she added.

"Yes, we must give him the benefit of the doubt as long as possible. I shall do lief. Suddenly a ring at the bell of the what I can for him, and must now see my solicitor to get his opinion."

"But you haven't had any lunch, dear." "No, I had forgotten that-I have no appetite," he said. "You must not leave until you have tasted my old nurse's cookery; she is the best cook in the world," saying which she hurried out of the room to consult Mr s. Simmons.

"I fear," she said, "Captain Fothergille has treated his wite shamefully, though the poor creature still loves and believes in him. She told me her story, part of which on consideration leads me to think he is arms, his face beaming with happiness. guilty of the terrible charge brought grateful this timely warning has been given against him. She rose from her bed one night, and coming into the room where she that made me jealous, that caused me such had a couple of hours previously left him bitter pain as wrought me to madness, for playing cards, saw him stand above the prostrate and bleeding body of his partner. A blow felled her to the ground, fever attacked her, and for a while her mind was unhinged. He put her in a mad Good -----, this is terrible," said the baronet, leaning back in his chair.

I have repented my stubborness and my of him; his servant said he was in France, for rest-and out into perilous sea of reck-folly, dear; for in punishing you I have at and she has been impatiently waiting his lessness where so many women go smiling the same time punished myself. Say you return. I told her where he was and she to their doom, to disappear beneath its went down to Hayton."

"Where he gave her one of the diamonds to sell for him

"I'm sure she had no idea it was stolen. blank the world looked to me when I You must see that she is set free, Dan-

> "No doubt they will discharge her to-"Then we must take care of her. She seems to have as little knowledge of the world as a child, and is quite penniless." "Very well, my dear, we will look after her and take care that she wants for nothincident of Felton finding the stolen jewels. were glimmering in the dusk. The roll of "But unfortunately that is not all," he cab wheels fell upon her ears; her heart added, "he stands at the present moment charged with murder." Ethel gave a cry, a look of horror came walk, the evening being fine. She listened

The clock struck eight; her aunt coughed, and moved uneasily. "Did you tell him we dined punctually at the hour?" she asked much to do I dare say," Mrs. Crayworth answered, irritably.

'I am not used to be kept waiting, and I know the dinner will be quite spoiled," the old lady grumbled.

Mrs Crayworth closed the window and returned to her seat. Her fears rose high-"The world's opinion will be indifferent | er and higher, like a black tide threatening to lay waste her hopes. She clasped her hands in agony; her temples throbbed with pain, induced by tension of the nerves. Every second added to her misery -to know the worst at once would be restreet door sounded through the house. She could not summon courage to leave the room and see if he had arrived, but waited, hearing steps gradually approach until a footman entered, bearing on a salver a letter he presented to her. She recognised Sympington's writing, and with trembling hands she took the envelope and gone. "Baron Handstein has just called on me and made some revelations regarding your voice. past life, which are supported by your letters. Having said this, I need scarcely add that all is over between us. I feel you who have been so kind would not part ! us after all this weary time; now that we me before I entered a life which must have shall be so happy together she said pleadended in misery for you and for me. It will be best we should not meet again .--ingly EZEKIAH HALWORTH SYMPINGTON."

shall do nothing to pain you.' She crushed the note in her hand, and sat, dry-eyed, staring before her, mentally in the tone of her voice, in the wildness of viewing the prospect of a better life slowly her manner, assured Lady Fothergille the fade into not ingness. She had played her game and lost, feeling this loss meant far mourn or perceive in the present; fearing breaking the news of the captain's death. this blow would be the first to send her drifting down the social stream past the me. I must wait here till he comes-he canpeaceful shores of conventionality where not be very long away." she had hoped to dwell-beyond the reach "Then she came from Australia in search of sheltering heavens where she had longed never saw him again?" white. "I should not care to live if we waters, unregretted, nameless, and unpitied.

> CHAPTER XXXIV .- AH, NO MORE PAIN.

on which her husband committed suicide, her face.

was my greatest happinness," she replied.

"Will you not take off your bon- | the next few minutes she might see him and hear once more that voice which fell as music on her ears. The door was opened by Barlyl, who started at sight of her and gazed at her a second or two without

DO YOU?

"Are you sure-perhaps he is expecting speaking. "Is he-Captain Fothergille-here?" "I am quite sure. He is not in town." she asked.

> "He is," the valet answered, gravely. 'They have just brought him.'

"Then tell him I am here, he will be glad."

Barlyl gazed at her curiously.

"Have you not heard ?" he asked.

"I have heard nothing. He would have come to me, but my impatience was so great I could not wait and I have so him. Let him know that I am here."

"That would be now impossible," he answered.

"No." Ethel answered, "rest assured I "I don't understand you," she said. putting one hand to her head as it pewildered.

"Come in and I will explain," he said, leading the way to the room where she had unhappy woman's reason had suffered a first seen him. Arriving here he handed shock since last they met, and fearful of her a chair, and standing a little way apart, the consequences, she resolved to postpone | began : "Something has happened-

"I know; but he has explained it, and I am free," she interrupted.

"Something has happened to your husband; cannot you guess; he will never see "You would be very unhappy if you you again."

"That is false, I have seen him, and nothing can separate us now."

"There is one thing which parts us all," were separated; the world would be empty to me without him." "But perhaps he was not always kind to you?" "That does not matter; his presence or hear you again-he is dead."

"Dead," she repeated, as if the word It was early in the afternoon of the day with a smile that brightened and beautified had no significance for her. "My husband dead! This is some trick by which you want to keep us apart-it cannot be, I'll not believe you.'

"No, if he doesn't come here soon, I

"But he must have been to the police

"Yes, he has been there, but he has

"Where ?" she demanded in an excited

"Are you keeping me from him? Surely

Something in the expression of her eyes,

"No, I am certain you would not pain

Mrs. Fothergille's face became deadly shall go to his rooms and seek him.'

"You will not find him there."

station," she said eagerly.

"I cannot say."

"Yes, but men are always late; he has once.

me." she said.

net?

have my own.

"I cannot give it to you, even if you had a right to it, which I deny.'

"Then there is but one thing left to me. I will tell the man who is about to marry you what character his future wife bears on the continent."

"Oh," she cried out, hearing the threat she had feared," you cannot do this; he would not believe you."

* I have some letters of yours which will convince him.'

"Baron," she said, in a pleading voice, "you would not ruin me. This man knows nothing of my past; in making me his wife he gives me a chance of beginning a new career, of becoming a better woman."

"I have no faith in your sudden conversion. You marry him to forward your own life.

"You loved me once, have mercy," she said, imploringly.

"You deceived and flung me aside without pity. I have no compassion for you now. For years you have duped men, led them to ruin and disgrace, aided a scoundrel because you profited by his cheating and feared his exposure. Pay me the money you owe me, your share, and we part forever; refuse and I will have my revenge," he said, his face flushed with an-

"I cannot," she said, standing up and facing him. "Go, and do your worst, no one will believe you, a foreign adventurer."

He laughed bitterly, and then snapped the fingers of his right hand. "As to being an adventurer, I can refer enquirers to the ambassador of my emperor, and as to believing me, I have your letters as proof that what I say of you is true. For the last time, I ask you to give me back the money stolen from me in your house."

The day had been when this man deemed it his greatest happiness to obey her commands; when a smile from her repaid him for his heaviest losses; when a sigh upon her lips brought him on his knees. She wondered if he still retained any of his old affection; or if indeed worldly experience on one hand, and the passage of time on the other, had deprived her of her former power over him. She would see.

"Baron," she said gently, covering her face with her hands, "I cannot bear that you of all men, should use such words to me. I loved you once, I love you still, for I have never forgotten you; surely you will not injure me?"

"Madame," he answered, "I don't believe one word of what you say. You loved my money in the past; if you ever thought of me since, it was to hope you should never encounter me again, to pray that I was in my grave. Will you make restitution, and give me back the money of which you cheated me?"

She was unable to give him what he demanded, for she had long since spent the money accumulated by her wits, and had for years lived up to the annuity inherited by her marriage settlement. Therefore she answered, "I haven't a penny saved, and I don't know one in the world of able, Baron, if you will not be merciful; the day may come when I can perhaps help "I knew that, and though I did not men- chimney-piece, watching the slow moveanswered. "You should have known nothing but death could part us." "I shall remember it in future. Am I quite forgiven?" he asked, striving to resume his old cheerful manner. "You are-you were an hour after I had left your home.

"Then whilst I have you with me I shall be happy, no matter what else may happen," he said.

She looked at him questioningly, and noted the grave expression of his face. "Why, what can happen to rob us of happiness ?" she asked.

"Nothing, dear," he replied, wishing to postpone all present reference to the captain's arrest. "And now tell me how is Hector-is he out of danger?'

"I hope so; his fever has been very interests, not in the hope of living a better | slight, and the fracture promises to heal rapidly. There is every hope for his life. You know Edith is with him?"

"I didn't till this morning. She read of the attempted murder in Galignani, and started at once from her college. Think what a shock she must have received." "It must have been terrible," he answered. "Poor Hector!" she said presently. "What enemy had he who would attempt to murder him?" "The police have made no discovery as yet." he replied, an expression of pain crossing his face. Since the previous night when the captain stood convicted as a thief and charged as a murderer, Sir Danvers had grave suspicions it was his cousin's hand had dealt Lord Hector the blow that well nigh proved fatal. No doubt, he considered, Maynes had become acquainted with some incidents in the captain's life which the latter wished to have forgotten, and feared would be disclosed. His cousin stood revealed in a new light from the sight of which the baronet turned away with loathing."

"Hector's marriage can no longer be kept secret from his father," Ethel said, after a few minutes' consideration.

"No; why should it? When he recovers I shall offer him Haynes' post as agent; you know Haynes leaves at Christmas. Maynes will then be independent of the duke.

"How good and thoughtful you are, Danvers. I'm sure Hector will be delighted to accept it, and it will make me so happy to have Edith near."

consideration in all things," he answered. "I feel I cannot sufficiently atone for the pain I have caused you."

"We will refer to it no more, dear; and if we think of it the memory will merely serve as a shadow to heighten the brightness of our joy," she replied.

"And now, Danvers, I have something to say which has troubled me and will, I fear, pain you."

"About the captain?" he said interrogatively.

"Yes, perhaps I should have written, but I preferred waiting until I could see you. Since I came here I learned he has a wife. I know he was paying more attention to Meg than was proper for a married whom I could beg or borrow. Be reason- man, and perhaps leading her to believe he loved her.

ing in the future." "You are always good and generous." Praise from her lips was very sweet to him; the sight of her face, the sound of her voice brought him such happiness as but a day or two ago he had never hoped to know again.

"I shall have to stay in town for some time owing to this unhappy business," he said, a look of pain crossing his face such as ever rested there when he thought of his cousin. "Don't you think we had better stay at the Bristol ?"

"If you like, dear, but we can be very comtortable here, and it you don't mind I had rather remain. We can dine at the Grand or the Metropolitan, but this place is more homely than an hotel."

"Then here we remain," said Sir Danvers. "Your will is mine. Besides that poor woman, Mrs. Fothergille, will return here, and I should not like to miss her.

"And now, Ethel, I must hurry away to Lincolns Inn or I shall miss my lawyer, and have to follow him to his home at Clapham, for I am resolved to see him before the day is over, and find out what can be done for this unfortunate man," he said, sighing deeply, for his cousin's fate weighed heavily on his mind. He had striven hard to hope the charge of murder was unfounded, but belief in the captain's innocence on that point had given way since he heard of Mrs. Fothergille's supposed dream, This unhappy man's prospects seemed black indeed, and the baronet felt his heart sink as he contemplated them.

"We must hope for the best dear," Ethel said, as he left the room, and her words rang in his ears, as he was driven at a rapid pace towards Lincolns Inn Fields.

At half-past seven o'clock, Mrs. Crayworth and her aunt sat waiting the coming of the Rev. Mr. Sympington. The former after having mentally revised her situation, and combatted a legion of fears, had evidently convinced herself that the Baron would not put his threat into execution. Although she had in a moment of anger called him an adventurer, she knew him to be a gentleman, and her vanity assured her that having once loved her, he cared "Your happiness, dear, shall be my first for her still; reasons she considered sufficient to prevent his revealing her past before the eyes of the unsophisticated curate.

She had spent some time before her toilet glass this evening, striving to erase all traces of care which the shock of the captain's suicide, and the terror of the baron's threats had left behind. After many anxious moments and skilful touches she had succeeded to her own satisfaction; and now clad in a gown of sage green velvet, which contrasted the alabaster whiteness of her ample bust, she sat in a state of nervous expectation, listening anxiously for the rap or ring which should announce the coming of her future husband. They were to dine at eight, but she felt assured he would arrive long before that hour, and she patiently turned her eyes to the little Louis Quatorze clock on the

that the necessary forms being complied with, Mrs. Fothergille was liberated from the Marlborough street police station. No mention was made to her of the fate which had befallen her husband, nor did she know he had been lodged within a few yards of her cell. The officials who were aware of her relationship to the deceased prisoner, did not consider themselves bound to enlighten her regarding his death, and therefore avoided incurring a scene concerning an act they regarded with short indifference. On what ground she was so speedily discharged she neither knew nor enquired, being quite satisfied the charge of robbery had been found a grievous mistake.

Once more free she glided through the streets scanning every face that approached her, as if fearful of being again arrested. Now and then she hesitated in her onward way, crossed to the opposite side of the thoroughfare, and occasionally laughed softly to herself. Her reason which had never fully recovered the fright of seeing her husband stand red-handed above the body of his victim, had received a shock when she was arrested that well-nigh flung it from its balance once more. Her stay in the cells of the police station had forcibly reminded her of the long and terrible days and nights she had spent in the madhouse, and preyed upon her mind. It had occurred to her that this charge of thieving was but another horrible dream which might perhaps cause her to be deprived again of the light of heaven, freedom of will, and companionship of her kind.

By slow degrees she arrived at Mrs. Simmons' house, and after considerable hesitation rapped timidly at the door, which was immediately opened by the maid of all works, who cried out-"Law, ma'am, is it you ?"

This exclamation brought the landlady into the hall, and before her, Mrs. Fothergille stood mute and motionless as if doubtful of her reception.

"Come in, my dear," said Mrs. Simmons compassionately, for news of the captain's suicide having at once been communicated by Felton to Sir Danvers had already reached the landlady's ears.

At sound of her kindly voice, she to whom the words were addressed glided swiftly forward, and putting her thin hands on Mrs. Simmons' ample arms, said in a wild hysterical voice, "It was all a mistake, I knew it would be, for he has been to explain, though I haven't seen him yet. Is he here?"

"Who ?" "My husband," she answered, not noting the pitiful expression that crossed her hearer's face. "You haven't been told ----" Mrs. Simmons began and then paused.

"Where he is--no, but I felt sure he would be here to wait for me, perhaps he will come later on," she added in a disappointed tone.

'Come and see my lady. Sir Danvers is staying here, but he has gone out. Just wait a moment until I tell her you have returned," she added, it occurring to her she had best warn Ethel of Mrs. Fothergille's ignorance of the captain's death.

She left the new made widow in the hall, but in a minute called over the banisters, "Come up, my dear," and Mrs. Fothergille obeying was met in the drawing-room

Ethel sighed. "Would you not like to come and live with me in the country, far removed from the noise and bustle of cities, surrounded only by friends who care for you?" she asked.

"Yes, if he were there. Wherever he opened the folding-doors, and there, in the is, there alone can I be happy."

and had to obey?"

"Then I should follow him."

to receive news of the suicide just then, and found it impossible to prepare her for the intelligence. She hoped that later on some suitable opportunity might arise to rang wildly through the room, break the news of the captain's death to his unhappy widow.

away when he called, I should never forgive myself for disappointing him; he is certain to come here," she said.

In the course of the afternoon Sir Danvers returned, looking jaded and dispirited. The news of his cousin's suicide had come upon him with a shock; the sight of the | ner was wild and excited, her voice loud igid form and bloodless face fixed in a and discordant. He feared that in her cynical smile, haunted him. He shook hands gravely with Mrs. Fothergille, and forewarned by Ethel, evaded her eager her since she first encountered the man who questions. Gradually she became calmer, a few hours previously ended his exisbeing fortified by the belief that his return tence. was now but a question of hours.

Next morning Sir Danvers attended the ingly. inquest, and the subsequent removal of the captain's body to his rooms, where it was to remain until arrangements for interment were completed. Ethel had again sought | horror-stricken valet, her arms outstretched, to break the tidings of the tragedy to the her head uplifted, as she rushed into the widow; but the slightest hint that her next room. Before reaching the door she husband would not return caused Mrs. suddenly paused, clasped her hands above Fothergille such excitement that she her heart, swayed a moment as if striving thought it best to wait until Sir Danvers | to keep her balance, and then with a deep was present to aid her in this painful

All through the afternoon Mrs. Fothergille wandered restlessly from room to room, talking to herself, laughing softly, fixed in a wild and ghastly stare on such singing snatches of songs, and exhibiting a sights as mortals might not see. No breath lightness of spirit she had not hitherto trembled on the white mouth; the heart shown. Every knock at the street door, throbbed no more; the tortured spirit had every ring at the bell, every footstep on found release from further sorrow. Barlyl the stair, made her start and tremble. She walked from window to window eagerly | the lips of the dead. watching the passengers in the street, listening to the roll of every cab, trusting it might stop before the house, longing with all her heart and soul to see the man whose quick return she prayed for fer- a countryman breaking into a lawyer's vently.

The day wore slowly and painfully away, but still she waited with unwavering trust, for had he not promised to seek her. As blurted out the visitor, "I wouldn't be evening advanced it suddenly occurred to contestin' it ef she wuzn't. You never her he might not know she was at Mrs. knowed that woman, I guess."-Detroit Simmons'. He was aware she had been taken to the police-court, and maybe believed she was there still. This idea troubled her, and gradually her patience gave way to uneasiness. The atmosphere of the house seemed to suffocate her, its rooms became as prison walls to her sight; its inmates as warders. They should not prevent her from seeing and letting him know she was free, and willing to join and remain with him for evermore.

Keeping her intention a secret from

"Then come with me, and you shall see for yourself," answered Barlyl, with pity in his eyes and gentleness in his tones. He dim light of the shaded chamber, she saw "But supposing he was summoned away, her husband lying white and rigid in his coffin. She stood silent and trembling on the threshold, stole forward, slowly, softly, Lady Fothergille saw she was not fitted and gently, until she stood beside the lifeless form, and with one outstretched hand touched the marble forehead. Then, suddenly, a loud peal of discordant laughter

"That is not my husband,,' she cried out. "You mock me, my husband is not Meanwhile, she postponed the task, and dead; he is waiting for me, but I cannot extracted a promise from Mrs. Fothergille find him, he is seeking me, and I stay here. that she would not leave the house that | This is but a dream in which I see him day. This was readily given. "If I were | lying there-white, cold, and helpless: a horrid dream from which I shall awake presently. Let me go," she cried, as Barlyl, seeing her intention to leave, barred her way with outstretched arms.

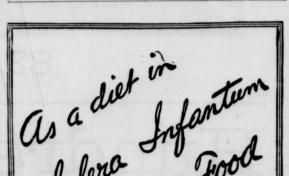

Her eyes were bright with a light that told reason had lost its balance, her manpresent state she might seek to end that life which had been so heavy a burden to "Stay here a little while," he said, sooth-

"I cannot, he expects me; he waits for me; listen, he calls me ! I come my love ! I come !" she exclaimed, dashing past the groan fell heavily forward. In a second Barlyl was kneeling beside her, raising the pale, sorrow-stricken face, clasping the thin worn form, gazing into those eyes bent down his head and reverently kisced

[THE END.]

"I want to contest my wife's will," said office early Monday morning. "Is she dead ?" inquired the lawyer, for want of Free Press.

"Until you have married that young simpleton—no. You shall pay me at once, or take the consequences," he said, bow- ing, and moving towards the door. "I am helpless," she said, extending her hands towards him beseechingly. For — sake, have pity on me." "You showed no pity to others. As you have treated them so shall I treat you," he answered, bowing once more. and leaving the room without another word. She flung herself down on a sofa, feeling	"O, Danvers, there surely must be some mistake," she said, shocked at the news. "Not in the least, the man is a thorough scoundrel," he replied, his honest eyes flashing with indignation. "Then you know it was he who—who stole the diamonds," she asked. "I do," he replied, and he told her the "I eat more Soup now than ever before" said a	denly stopped, and longing for the quarters to chime. She made no effort to sustain a conversation with her invalid aunt, she could scarcely control her thoughts suffi- ciently to give lucid answers to the ques- tions asked. She found it impossible to subdue her nervousness. It was now a quarter to eight, and he had not put in an appearance; she rose, walked to one of the windows, and gazed into the street, where the yellow lights of the gas lamps	comed her back. "My husband has been to the police sta- tion and explained the mistake, but I haven't seen him: I fancied he would be here with you. Has he been?" Mrs. Fot- hergille asked. "No, dear, I haven't seen him," replied Ethel, wondering if she had better break the intelligence of the captain's fate at Natures cure is the best and simplest. Drink the Natural Sna water. Wilmot Lemonade, Club Soda	shadow, glided swiftly down the street, scarcely knowing where to turn, yet invol- untarily directing her steps to the quarter in which his rooms were situated. The thoroughfare was almost deserted as she entered it, and with hesitating steps ap- proached the house she had passed and re- passed on many a weary day. At sound of the bell ringing in answer to her touch, she started; what if he did not wish her to call !	Chore milk super-
She flung herself down on a sofa, feeling	"I eat more Soup now than ever before" said a friend to us one day. "How is that?" "Because Kerr Evaporated Vecetbales makes Soup taste	"I believe your Kerr Evaporated Vegetables for soup are going to come into common use" said a	or Ginger Ale made from these waters and pleasantly	She could scarcely suppress her excite-	