If the assertions of the Pall Mall Budget are to be credited, there is a reason to believe that the world of art will ere long welcome the return of the missing picture, the famous portrait of the Duchess of Devonshire, by GAINSBOROUGH. This painter has been dead for more than a century, but it was only a little over fifty years ago that this particular picture came to the front in a singular way, and has had a still more singular history since its existence.

The subject of the picture was the beautiful Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire who was no unimportant factor in English politics of the early port of the Georgian ago. era. Nothing appears to have been known of it from the death of GAINSBOROUGH, in 1788, until the year 1839, when a picture restorer, named BENTLEY. bought it from a Mrs. MAGENNIS, in 1839, paying her fifty pounds for it. Soon afterwards it was sold for fifty guineas, but the purchaser this time was a Mr. WYNN ELLIS, a famous collector. In 1876, at the well-known CHRISTIE'S auction rooms, this picture was the subject of a fierce competition, falling at last to the Messrs Agnew, at the fine figure of £10,100 or fifty thousand five hundred dollars. The AGNEWS placed it in their galleries on exhibition, and it was the talk of the day in fashionable London. On the night of the 24th of May, 1876, eighteen days after securing the picture, the AGNEWS closed their gallery at eleven o'clock, leaving a watchman on the premises. At seven o'clock on the following morning the picture had disappeared. Thieves had entered by a window, cut the canvas from its frame and vanished.

That was seventeen years ago, and from that day to this, despite the efforts of the police and the offer of liberal rewards all attempts to have the picture have ended in failure. It had been taken, apparently, with the same idea that the body of the millionaire STEWART had been stolen in Mew York, namely that negotiations for its ransom could be carried on, the picture be restored and the thieves pocket the ransom money. In the case of STEWART'S body, this programme was carried out, but they do things differently in England, and though the AGNEWS received letters proposing negotiations nothing resulted. After a time the letters ceased to come, and the picture was given up as lost.

Quite recently, however, a convict in a Belgian prison has been seen by a representative of the Budget, and has made a confession that he was the man who stole the picture, which is still in existence. His story is a very interesting one, and whether it is true or not is very circumstantially told. Having taken the picture, and failing to induce the owners to negotate with him, he was sorely puzzled what to do with his treasure. There was a great risk in keeping it, nor could he melt it up as he could have done with articles of gold, silver, or even brass. There was a fortune in his hands, but he might have starved to death for all the use it was to him. Fortunately, from his point of view, he embarked in another felonious enterpise from which he realized some $300,000, and was therefore financially independent for a time. He lived in Picadilly as a gentlemen of means, had his carriages, his yacht, and was quite "in the swim" in a circle of society which might be aristocratic as society goes in Canada, and was at least respectable

All this time he had the picture concealed on his premises, a valuable yet wholly unavailable asset. He had no accomplices, auction, buy it for a trifle, and then on the cleaning of it have the discovery of the under picture as a matter of accident. The run the risk.

So nothing was done with the stolen picture, He kept it, because it seemed like a woeful waste to destroy it, and he is believed to know where to put his hands upon it at the present time.

This bold but blundering thief has been known to the European police as ADAM WORTH. He is a native of this continent, and if Progress be correctly informed, he had a sufficient "record" in New York, at an early age, to make his exodus to Europe a very prudent step. The stealing of the picture was a very easy piece of work for him, as was his subsequent acquisition of the funds which gave him a career of luxurious ease. These, however, could not last forever, and he again entered on the practice of his profession, securing good returns and achieving an international fame' but finally, with all his cunning and experience, getting "the collar" in such a small and officially stupid country as

The question which some of the English papers seem to be discussing is as to whether WORTH stole the picture or whether he is merely endeavoring to make terms for himself in his present trouble by KNOWLES' BUILDING, Cor. GRANVILLE and an ingenious and circumstantial lie. The latest reports indicate that the AGNEWS believe the story and that negotiations are pending for the return of the picture. They have had pretty good evidence of it in their correspondence in the past, by the receipt of a piece of canvass which exactly fitted a certain part of the stretcher from which the portrait had been cut. Some of the readers of Progress may, perhaps, be aware that in the negotations for STEW-ART'S remains, a piece of the covering of the coffin was sent as a voucher in the same way, and was the means of satisfying the representatives of the estate. The entire business of the stolen English picture has a genuine New York flavor about it, and had an American agency had the opportunity given to Scotland Yard, the picture would have been recovered long

Instead of this however, the AGNEWS have shown a thoroughly British spirit in insisting that their reward of $5,000 included the capture of the thief as well as the return of the picture. They now assert that they could have had the latter back on several occasions by paying $1,000 or $1, 500, but declined because the bargain did not include the delivery of the thief. It is probable they are not inclined to avail themselves of the resources of civilization by which felonies are compounded on this side of the water.

In the meantime the world of art will be glad to know that the picture is still safe, and that if it has not been damaged too much by the methods used for its concealment it will at some future time be more valuable than ever.

"LEAD KINDLY LIGHT."

A leading London newspaper had the following editorial paragraph recently:

The accounts of recent services-funerals particularly-show the persistent popularity of Cardinal NEWMAN's hymn, "Lead kindly Light." One is almost persuaded that a technical flaw of some kind is a condition of popularity; and these verses express their beautiful and sincere feeling in spite of the gravest flaw a poem can have-complete insincerity of imagery. The writer in one verse laments his former love of the "garish day," and in another utters his final hope and expectation of the dawn, and this wobbly imagination is displayed in a very short piece. If one may say so without disrespect, Cardinal NEWMAN, as a poet, did not "jine his flats." Of the two incongruous images, the second, though extremely banal, is the best. There is something shocking in making the good daylight represent pride or evil; something, also, much against the childish feeling of poetry in all time.

The criticism does not appear to be sound, for certainly to those who enter into the spirit of the poem there is a clear distinction between the "garish day" in which worldly pride ruled the will, and the dawn in which "bright angel faces smile." There can be nothing "shocking" in the reference to the garish day in which self confidence usurped the place of a virtuous self distrust and a reliance on GoD.

One, perhaps, needs to have had some such spiritual experience as NEWMAN had in order to enter into the spirit of his words. It is true here, as well as in England, that the hymn has a wide popularity, and it is common at funeral services, though it is in no sense a funeral hymn. It has been sung in some instances because it was a favorite with the deceased persons, and in other cases for the reason that the tune seemed to touch the hearts of the living. While there are two or three settings, that almost invariably used is "the Lux Benigna" of Dr. DYKES, and NEWMAN himself believed that this tune was the secret of the popularity of the hymn. As regards funeral occasions, the words have little application to either the dead or those who survive. They are the expression of a troubled spirit, which sees through the night of darkness and doubt the light that will guide to the haven of peace. While they were written twelve years before and the secret was wholly his own. He NEWMAN entered the Roman catholic dared not confide in anybody, and this fact | communion, no one who has felt an interprevented the carying out of a really bright est in his experience can interpret them idea which occurred to him. It was nothing otherwise than as a prayer for guidance, less than to have some ordinary picture and the answer to that prayer must be painted over the canvas, have it put up at looked for in NEWMAN's later life. Nevertheless, the poem is found in most of the protestant collection of hymns, and will likely continue to be as popular in the conveying out of this scheme would future as it has been in the past. It cannecessitate the taking of several persons not be questioned, however, that the exinto his confidence, and he was afraid to ceedingly beautiful tune of Dr. DYKES' is an important factor in the matter.

The Flirt.

(ADVICE TO A FRIEND.) Dear Bill, give up your foolish ways Of sparkling every lass. Whose charming smiles and ribbons bright Attract you as you pass. Those damsels fair with golden hair

Are lovely, sweet and funny, They'll flirt with every "nice young man," Who'll waste on them his money.

They love to get a fellow's heart "All broke up" on their own, And use him as an instrument To spite the gals in town, They laugh and talk as tho' in love Their victim to beguile, And throw cute winks across the street To lads who nod and smile.

The boys they all were smitten once Their "jink" and spare cash went For ice-cream sodas, candies rare, For drives, bouquets and scent. But when those darling little dears Ice-creams no more could get They jilted them and soon hung out

Their ,'shingle" for "to let." And thus fools go and thus fools come By Nature's "sign" attracted Such bliss they picture to themselves Until they are distracted. They think they'll wed this "little bud" -And keep on thinking so-

But Bill dear, keep your courage up, Pretend your dreadful shy, To right or left cast not a look, As the pretty flirt goes by. Just mash some modest maiden fair With loving heart and true, Who'll make you happy all thro' life, Which silly flirts can't do.

Their money's gone-so's the flirt-

SCIENTISTS AND SONG.

An Explanatory Remonstrance in Regard to Certain Verses.

A short time before the Summer School of Science went to Sackville there appeared in the Chignecto Post some verses which were afterwards sung by the scientists. An item which has since appeared in some Nova Scotia papers states that the writer of those verses had "composed a song for the members of the Summer School of Science," and that it had been "accepted by them." That this account of of the origin of the song is not entirely accurate, is evident from the following explanatory remonstrance, which appeared in the Post after the scientists left Sackville, and which has probably not been seen by the majority of them :-

EDITOR CHIGNECTO POST—Dear Sir: A sudden thrill of pride followed by a relapse reading this item in the Science School despatch in the St. John Sun;

"The scientists have adopted as their school song the verses by "Haw!" in the Chignecto Post. These will be sung on closing and on other occasions. The tune is "My Own Canadian Home."

Now when with the embarrassing aid o all the Nine Muses I wrote those lines, I did not dream that they would be sung. The piece was labelled, A Summer School of Science Song, simply for the sake alliteration, that device so pleasing to the eye and so confusing to the tongue. If I had intended it for a song I should have thrown in a few semi-quavers, and have manufactured a tune to it. It saddens me to think how the anatomy of that beautiful poem must have been twisted in order to make it work along with the tune of "My own Canadian Home." It is a distressing thing to reflect how, when a charming scientific soprano has struggled to get away up to High F, her voice must be injured in trying to crowd two syllables into the place that the careful composer of the tune intended for only one.

It the piece is sung as it was written, it must, by this time, be burdened with anachronisms. To go over the poem carefully, changing future time to past, might, however, be time ill-spent, as some might, though the force of habit, continue to sing in the future tense. The combination of the old and revised versions, sung to a misfit tune, might produce sound waves that would dash with considerable violence against the innate ear.

The part of the effusion referring to the scientists tramping down hay, which owed its birth to the erroneous idea that there must be a word in the piece to rhyme with alas! they'll tramp down grass! It could not then grate on the ears of scientific agriculturists. The only way to make that song popular is to sing it in accordance with a wellknown scientific axiom. It has been found that sounds can be made so far up the scale somewhere along the last letters of the alphabet—as to be indistinct to human ears. It has also been discovered by scientists working for the good of mankind that a solo-or any other similar instrument of torture-can be rendered to use a familiar expression "so low you can't hear it." Now if that song is sung somewhere up in X alt, with frequent changes (upon the singers becoming fatigued) to low 'minus B,' it is surprising how much more appreciated it might become, even by those not well versed in the science of Another thing that scientists have discovered-not summer scientists, but those who keep the thing up all the year round -is that every building has a key, a musical key, by which it can be unlocked. In other words, if you take a structure and find the key to which its molecules will respond, and keep dinging at that particular key in the hearing of that particular structure, there is going to be a grand crash if the music does not stop. I must therefore particularly caution vocalists not to sing that song in the key of F too near the Sackville covered bridge. There is one thing, however, that I must congratulate the scientists upon, and that is the successful removal of the Sackville post-office by a judicious use of the proper key.

Let me make the songs of the scientists, and I don't care the atomic weight of hydrogen gas if Boyle, or Avogadro, or Newton makes their laws. And now, O scientific folk, tarewell. May you, who in your summer studies have been led to seek Truth, that rare maiden who is supposed to dwell in a place where H2O is free from nitrates and carbonates, find her and give her an elementary aquaintance with the other seventy odd elements. so that, hand in hand with Science, she may force Superstition and Ignorance into 'Stygian caves' mid sights and sounds unholy. And when you leave this gravityswung planet, if you have held to Truth and the right, may you be whisked through chromospherically warmed ether on your way to make a continuous spectrum analysis of the brightness of the regions above. The advice of your humble servant is 'Turn to the right, although his name is HAW Parrsboro, N. S.

TO THE EDITOR OF PROGRESS: You could do good work by calling the attention of the people in power to effect a reform in the public library (North End). into sadness, these were my feelings upon | The writer is a visitor here since the latter part of June, and spent a few hours on two different days, very agreeably entertained with the choice magazines, papers, etc., with which the library is well stocked, but the lack of system, of order in caring for the stock, is very apparent. The table is heaped with the different magazines in a heterogenous mass, most of which date back for a year or more, and to get a magazine of a particular date would be much the same kind of work as looking for a "needle in a hay stack." Then I was told that some of the magazines of the latest numbers, are always kept for a choice few of the librarian's friends to look at, previous to being laid on the table at all.
