While society has not been especially gay during the week it has been quite cheerful. The very hot weather is no doubt responsible for the lassitude prevailing in social circles. Every one who can conveniently manage to go, is out of town for the heated term, but those, who through business, or other interests, are obliged to remain in the city, find life quite endurable after all; and what is of very great importance, are perhaps getting more real rest than those who are seeking change, 1. e. pleasure, in other places. It is a well known fact that the majority who spend the summer at any of the tashionable resorts generally come home much more exhausted and worn out than they were at the beginning of the season. so perhaps even a summer spent in the city is not without its advantages and considerations; though to be sure at this particular time inclination goes strongly out towards the dancing wares, shining sands, and brine scented breezes of the sea shore or the quiet of sylvan glades. However, as I said before life in social circles is quite cheerful just
