CHUNK'S FATAL JEALOUSY

Head of the Cowboy Who Kept Order on Raton Range.

The reminiscent cowboy rolled and lighted a cigarette. He was about forty-five, tall, spare, yet by no means thin.

In his great shock of raven hair, struggling from underneath his sombrero, there was a touch of gray here and there.

His legs were slightly bowed, a result of years spent in the saddle. He was a fair type of Western cowboy that is now disappearing from the plains.

"But twenty years ago I struck the Raton Range," he said "and then days was surely sizzlers in northern New Mexico. Coifax county has always been one of the toughest spots on the map, and it was worse than at any time just then."

You see, it's the first county over the Colorado line as you come down the mountains from the Raton Pass, and was then a sort of dumping ground for all the tough ones not allowed in Colorado.

"There drifted down from the pass one day a pretty tough customer. He was a fine-looking boy, with just the middle sort o' blue eyes and the finest brown hair for a man that had ever passed over the range, but he had a way of his own in twirling a six-shooter that made the citizens respect him."

He made a reputation the second night after he struck Otero—which was then the first town you came to over the line—by plumping the lights out o' two fellows that had been shooting the lights out in the town. This made a mighty fine impression on the good citizens, for no one had been able to keep a lamp lit in the public places for a week. So the good citizens of Otero offered to make him marshal, but he said no, he guessed he could keep order without being marshal.

"Nobody knew his name. They never did know. They called him 'Chunk,' which came of a remark some one had made that he always had so many cartridges about him he was like a chunk o' lead."

"Chunk killed another fellow the next week who was trying to steal a horse, and the next week he got onto the trail o' two fellows that had stole horses, and when he came back to town he told the good citizens where their bodies might be found, so they went out and brought the dead horse thieves in and buried them over in the foothills alongside o' the other three that Chunk had killed, and the place was known as Chunk's graveyard."

"Chunk was a fond sort o' fellow at heart, but sometimes when he had too much liquor it was dangerous to be too close to his gun, so that with those who went to death by such accidents and those who were sent to death because they deserved it, Chunk's graveyard grew in about a year to twelve."

"Now, at this time there was a cowboy in Coifax—Clay Ellison—famous from one county line to the other because of his good six shooter. Clay was a terror to rustlers. There's no telling how many of them had bit the dust at the crack o' his gun. He most likely didn't know himself. Clay came o' Otero one day and the people made a regular hero of him, and what does Chunk do but get jealous and commence to su'k and say ugly things about Clay, so that every one in town held his breath almost, fearing the meeting of these two."

"And they did meet, too. Clay never no'ched his six-shooter, but Chunk v'p notched that way of every man he'd killed."

"You're a good shot," says Chunk to Clay; "I've thirteen notches on my gun; twelve of them are dead; the thirteenth is for you."

"You're a brave man," says Clay. "My gun has never been drawn again such as you."

"There's only room for one of us in Coifax," says Chunk. "Leave the country and I'll cross your rotch."

"If it has come to that," says Clay, "the notch can stand, or I will cross it out my self."

Chunk's idea was that both should go together to a room at the tavern, order a supper placed upon the table, lock the door, and just them two sit down to eat, without another person in the room. They would sit down together, but only one was to rise. Clay agreed to all that Chunk said, and the Clifton House was chosen, a tavern where many a one's blood had been spilled there since—a lonesome sort o' place a mile o' town on the Santa Fe trail.

You can see the deserted old house to this day, a lurking place for ghosts, they say. Well, they called for the best supper that the tavern could turn out, and everyone thought that Clay and Chunk had joined hands, and were going to cement the friendship over this supper. When the door was locked they put their pistols on the table the first thing they did. "That's a pretty good-looking weapon," Clay says, Chunk, eyeing sharply as they both sat down, Clay nodded his head, but didn't say anything.

"They put their pistols on their laps by agreement, and began to eat."

"You don't seem to be very hungry, Clay," says Chunk after a bit, for Clay was not eating much, and Chunk was in fine spirits.

"I never eat much just before going to bed," says Clay. "It don't set right on my stomach."

"Chunk smiled, for he could get humor out o' most anything, but Clay was as stern as a preacher in the middle of a sermon, and he never smiled much any way. Things went on for about a quarter of an hour, and neither had made the least move for his gun, and both began to feel that it was time something should happen, for it was mighty trying to just sit there and see the glitter in each other's eyes."

"Try some of this, Clay," says Chunk, and as Clay reaches for the dish, quick as a flash o' steel, Chunk brings his pistol up. But he was too quick—too quick to calculate. He has plenty o' time and all the advantage, but it seems he was rattled, and for the first time in his life. His six-shooter struck the table, and the bullet set to wild o' Clay's head, and, quick as he was to recover, he was just an eternity too late, for Clay brought his weapon up so soon that you could hardly tell one pistol's report from the other, and Chunk laid a thought he was taking a quiet nap."

"They turned him over in the foothills in the graveyard he had himself made, and you may read on the only tombstone in the place these words:

CHUNK.

A Hundred Miles an Hour

An electrical engineer has been exhibiting in London the model of his proposed single rail electric line for speeds of 150 miles an hour. The rail is fixed on a V-shaped trestle, and runs up into the body of the car, which, as it were runs stride of it. The car runs on twelve bearing wheels and seats 135 passengers, with space for baggage. One of the difficulties met with in schemes for excessively high speed travel is the tendency of the car to run off the rails. But in this late scheme the great difficulty seems to be the passenger when the train took a sharp curve while going at 150 miles an hour is not explained.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Fashionable Millinery

We are now, and have been for years, the leaders par excellence of FASHIONABLE MILLINERY—not a mere ordinary stock, sold at ordinary prices, in the ordinary way, but such a collection of that suggest something bigger than Moncton, and something better than you'll find in New Brunswick. It sounds commonplace to say that, but the business we're doing is by no means commonplace.

For the convenience of our St. John customers we have opened

The Parisian Millinery Store, 165 UNION STREET, where we have no hesitation in saying the finest assortment of millinery ever shown in New Brunswick is now on exhibition.

You are welcome to inspect our Paris Pattern Hats and Bonnets whether you buy or not.
