PROGRESS, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1898.

米 A DAUGHTER OF JUDAS. 米潮

By the Author of "Sir Lionel's Wife," "The Great Moreland Tragedy," Etc

CONTINUED.

CHAPTER LXVII.-Continued.

Dr. Browne saw it, and preceeded, more solemnly and impressively than ever-

'That is, of course, unless such confession of one's sins would right a wrong. There can be no true spirit of repentance without a desire to make reparation. It, by any sin of yours, you have injured another, and it is in your power to repair the injury before you leave this world, I exhort you, most solemnly, and in the name of God, who is your Maker, and must be your Judge, to devote your last moments to making such a contession as may most effectually undo your sin.'

No priest could have spoken with a more thrilling solemnity and earnestness than did Dr. Browne, as he thus exhorted his dying patient.

His words were not without effect. Rochefort turned to his sister with an imploring eye, and murmured, faintly-

'Leila, it must be so. I feel myself a coward at the last. I dare not face death with that load of guilt upon my soul.'

She started forward, like one in mortal terror.

Her face blanched, her nostrils quivering.

'Louis !' she almost shrieked. 'Reflect ! Consider ! Be firm ! Die like a man. You have mocked at priestly juggling all your life. Do not fall a victim to it now.

The death-sweat stood in beads on Rochefort's brow.

He trembled in every limb.

The doctor saw his irresolution, and, with a firm, though gentle hand, held back the woman, as she would have flung herself on her knees beside her brother.

'You shall not !' she panted. 'You shall not wrest his secret from him. This is my house. I bid you leave it. My brother shall die in peace. Go ! I command you !'

said Dr. Browne, with deep solemnity, wondering much what would be this darkly mysterious confession he was about to hear. 'Then listen,' said Louis Rochefort, in a faint, hollow voice, and he began his story.

Just as the first sunbeams glanced into that room, Louis Rochetort drew his last faint breath.

Dr. Browne, pale with the horrors of the night, closed the dead man's eyes reverently, and composed his limbs for burial.

Then he turned to the woman who still sat with her face buried in her hands.

The glance he cast upon her was strangely compounded of horror, pity and repulsion; but his voice was perfectly calm as he said-

'Listen to what I have to say.' She did not move-did not so much as raise her head.

'You hear me ?'

him she was listening.

voice-'I want you to understand that you are free to make your escape from here, if such is your desire. Your brother's contession must. of course, be made known to Sir Gerald Vere, and Miss Lisle be restored to her friends at once. But I shall rigidly keep my word. No ill-consequences will fall on you, unless you wilfully draw them down on your own head.'

seemed to strangely mingle, passed out of

Then she sprang to her feet. swift as lighting, and, crossing to the bed, looked down at the lifeless form with furious passion in her eyes. 'Coward ! Poltroon !' she hissed into the faintly, 'or should be if the heat were a little less intense."

'My dearest, the weather is delightfultruly delightful ' declared the countess, with energy. 'If you complain of that you must be ill. The truth is you mope too much.'

'Mope !' repeated Lilian, still smiling, but looking as though she was a little startled at the word.

'Yes, indeed, my love ! What is it but moping, to lie on a couch on this too lovely day, when the sun is shining, and the birds are singing, and the flowers are blooming ? Ah, my dear, when you are as old as I am you will know that life is too short for us to lose the brightness of any of its sunny days !'

'Yes ; life is short !' said Lilian, in a slow musing tone, while a shadow stole into her lovely eyes. 'And death lurks even among the flowers. Ab, countess ! sometimes I sit and think about these things until my heart is heavy as lead within me.

To the young, death is so terrible, and yet it comes to them as well as to the old. sit and wonder why it must be so.

'Ah, now you are getting positively morbid ! I see I must carry you away. and find you cheerfulness. But where is Sir Gerald? I am wanting to give him one grand scolding. He is not what you call a model husband; he leaves you too much alone.' A wave of colour swept across the paleness of Lady Vere.

She looked up, eagerly, to say-

'Oh, no, indeed ! You must not think that. Sir Gerald is all goodness. It is only when he cannot be with me, that I am left alone. He has so much business on his hands just now. If it were not tor that, he would be with me always.'

The French countess gave a shrill little laugh-a laugh of very genuine amusement

'Mon Dieu ! But you have plenty of faith my child. You are as innocent as one little daisy. Business ! And you really believe in that ? When I see Sir Gerald, I will tell him he has for a wife the most trusting angel in the world.'

Lilian rose, with a look of gentle dignity.

'Indeed, countess,' she said. 'I assure you that, with a man like Sir Gerald, a wite needs only to be a true woman, not at all an angel, to be certain she can trust his word.' The countess laughed gaily, and sbrugg-ed her shoulders.

Comtesse.

of course. Do come.

save her golden hair.

loveliness.

sad one.

short.'

She was a veritable Frenchwoman, gay, good-humored, kind-hearted, and volatile.

neglectful of his beautiful young wife; but it she, the paure innocente, chose to defend

'At any rate, come out with me this afternoon !' she said, gaily. 'I am going to the picture gallery. Vinadi's new picture is there, and everybody is raving over it,

'Certainly I will if you really wish it. It is very good of you to want me,' returned calm and tranquil, but with a certain look of sadness in her eyes, which added to,

rather than deatracted from, her beauty.

She was dressed entirely in black, with a

They drove to the gallery where the

A truly noble picture it was, but a very

The girl's face was as fair as the morning, and as bright and blooming as the flowers that surrounded her on every side.

picture of the year was being exhibted.

Youth and health alike seemed hers but, from out a bower of roses behind her. a ghastly form was stealing-a skeleton shape, with a dart in its upraised hand, levelled at the maiden.

The artist had given to his picture a name which was at once short and strik-

It consisted of but one word-'Death.' The countess was voluable in her praise of the picture.

She fell into ecstavies over it, appraising its merits in English and French by turns.

Lady Vere, on the contrary, stood and gazed at it in perfect silence, her beautitul face very pale, a strangely sorrowlul look in her dark eyes.

'Mon Dieu ! is it not charmant-ravishing-suberb-magnificent ?' cried the countess, as her raptures reached a climax. 'It is very sad,' said Lilian slowly. Very sad, and very terrible.'

And she gave a little shiver as she turned away from the picture, and walked to the further end of the gallery, as though she resolved not to look at it again.

Two young men were sitting on a velvet lounge-both Italians, and artistslooked after her with glances of deep interest and admiration.

'Did you ever see anything so perfectly lovely as that girl's face?' said one. 'Who is she, I wonder? Just notice the pose of her head. How gloriously regal! That is just the sort of woman you ought to paint for and empress or a queen.'

'II'm she is wonderfully beautiful. ] don't know that I ever saw a more perfect face, But, Verdi, the most striking thing about her you don't seem to have noticed at all.'

'Sacre ! And pray what is that?' 'Why. the look in her eyes is exactly the look in the eyes of the girl there.'

And he pointed to the painting. 'Impossible! Vinadi's maiden has eyes of the loveliest summer blue. They are the colohr of forget-me-nots. Miladi's there are as dark as night. They have all the dept of colouring of a purple pansy.'

'I spoke not of colour but of expression,' said the other impatiently. 'It is possible you don't see what I mean? Vinadi has painted his maden with eyes such as you never see except in those who die | lin. an early death. That, to my mind, is one of the greatest beauties of his picture. And the English miladi has just that look. She is not long for this world. Mark my words.

His face was flushed, but his eyes had a terribly baggard look.

A keen observer of human nature would have said that a man with such a look as that was either the bearer of, untold misery or the perpetrator of some dark and secret crime.

He threw himself into a velvet loungingchair, with an air of being thoroughly wornout, and, fixing his eyes on vacancy, seemed to fall into a train of moody thought.

A soft tap at the door made him look up impatiently.

The next moment the door opened, and Lady Vere, timidly hesitant, stood upon the threshhold.

He started up from his chair, amazement writ legibly on his brow.

'You ?' he said, incredulously, as though he deemed it passing strange that she, his wife, should come to her husband's room.

'Yes, it is I,' she said, gently, and with supplicating look. 'Gerald, may I come

D-

20

He did not answer in words at all.

He sank into his chair again, and signed to her, with an imperative, almost a fierce, gesture, to close the door.

She obeyed, and then advanced into the room with that slow, undulating grace of movement which was at once the envy and the despair of every woman who knew her. She was all in white, a robe de chambre, of thick ivory satin, falling in long straight folds to her feet.

Her face still wore that interesting delicacy, that look of langour which so heightened her beauty.

Her long golden hair was unbound, and fell, in rippling masses, below her waist.

'Gerald,' she said, standing in front of him, and speaking with a beseeching timidity which contrasted painfully with the grand imperial character of her loveliness. 'Gerald, will you listen to me ?'

He averted his eyes from her shading them with his hand, while his teeth all but met through his nether lip.

'Gerald !' she took a step nearer to him, while her voice sank to a low entreating whisper. 'Oh my husband ! if you only would have faith in me !'

Something like a smile-a bitter, cruel smile of derision-crossed his face, though still his teeth were biting fiercely at his

'Have faith in you ! he repeated, after momentary silence. Faith! In you! My God ! what shall I hear of next ?'

There was a note of passion in his voice

With a gesture of her hand she showed He went on, still in a very calm quiet

She did not answer; and he, with another glance, in which horror and pity the room, leaving her alone with the dead.

dead ear. 'It that man is right, and there

And, with an imperious gesture, she a life beyond the grave, I pray that my curse may reach you there ! It I were sure pointed to the door. But the young English doctor rose to the occasion. 'Madame,' he said, in a low stern voice, while his awkward figure and plain features seemed invested with a new and striking dignity, born of the earnestness within him, 'I refuse to recognise your right to banish me from a room where I have a dying patient. My place is by his side. I decline to leave him, and I warn you, that if you attempt to prevent him from making the confession, which alone can give him peace of mind, you will bring upon yourself a suspicion you may not find easy to remove. You will understand me better if I say I am the doctor who, last year, attended Miss Kate Lisle in a certain mysterious ill ness, and that I am determined not to rest until I have restored that unfortunate yonng lady to her home and friends.'

10

He had shot an arrow at a venture, but he saw, in a moment, it had found its mark. The woman shrank beneath his clear, accusing gaze.

She trembled, and her face grew almost as ashen pale as that of the dying man.

The doctor, conscious that he had conquered, and seeing clearly that Rocheforts' life was ebbing away with appalling swiftness, drew a chair to the bedside; and, first administering a strong cordial, drew forth his pocket book, and prepared, if need were, to take down some notes of the life. I have listened to a story the most confession.

Leila had retired to the further end of the room, and was sitting with her face buried in her hands.

Rochefort turned his dying eyes toward her, and said, in a faint voice-

'Leila, forgive me!'

'I will not forgive you !' she answered, sullenly. 'You will take my curse with you to your grave. A man who, for his own paltry fears, will destroy his sister, is so poor a coward, that I despise myself is Sir Gerald Vere.' when I remember one mother bore us both !'

It was a bitter speech, and delivered with merciless resentment.

Rochefort, however, made another attempt to conciliate her.

'I shall not destroy my sister !' he said, with a faint return of energy. 'Sooner than that. I would go down to my grave with dens, and flower decked terraces, a piazza, my lips sealed,-ay, though I knew I was going to perdition. But, Leila, you know, as well as I, how sately you may trust to Sir Gerald Vere.

'Fool !' said the woman, fiercely. 'Is it Sir Gerald Vere alone we have to deal with ? What of this man ?'

And she pointed, with a passionate gesture, towards Dr. Browne.

Rochefort fixed his dark, hollow eyes on the doctor with a look of such haunting solemnity as only the dying can bestow.

'Swear !' he said, slowly, 'swear by the God in whom you lrust, that, no matter what the nature of the crimes I reveal to you, you will not seek to betray the perpetrators of them to justice. A priest observes inviclable whatever is imparted to him in confession. Swear to me that you will do the same.'

Small Pill. 'I swear it,' said the doctor, firmly, her here, if you please.' Small Doser 'I beg you will not,' said Lilian smiling provided no one will be injured by my The servant withdrew, and, in a moment Small Price. faintly. In a train speeding sonthward—that is, from Nice to Naples-John Morewood Her beautiful face, however, remained or so, returned to usher in the visitor, a silence. Not otherwise.' Substitution was seated, with a shocked, grieved look 'No one will be injured. Such wrongs as French countess, who was staying at perfectly colourness. If the young Italian artist could have upon his face. can be redressed, will be redressed. I only Naples, and, having met Sir Gerald's the fraud of the day. beautiful young wife at one of the saloons, seen her then, hn would have said, more ask that you will abstain from giving a Costinued on Fifteenth Page. had taken a tremendous fancy to her. positively than ever, that in her eyes there criminal up to justice for crimes which are See you get Carter's, 'My dear love,' she said, seating herself lurked the shadow of a coming doom. things of the past, and quite irreparable.' on the couch by Lillian's side, and taking 'That I most colemnly promise.' And Tumor both her hands in hers, with all a French-Ask for Carter's, Late that night Sir Gerald Vere entered 'Swear it !' said the dying man, with cured to stay cured, a woman's effusion. 'My dear love how bis own apartments, having only just refeverish energy. home; no knife, plaster The woman still sat in that attitude of pale you look-positvely distraite, I do as-sullen despair, her face buried in her sure yon. I am perfectly desolee to see turned home after an absence of several Insist and demand* hours, spent in walking gloomily along the or pain. For Canadian testimonials & 130-page book—free, write Dept.11, MASON MEDICINE Co., 577 Sherbourne Street, Toronto Ontario. you like this.' white dusty, roads outside the town of hands. 'I am quite well,' said Lilian, smiling | Carter's Little Liver Pills. Naples. 'I swear it-by the God who made me !'

of it, I would pursue you-to show you whether I fear death. As it is I curse you and rejoice to think that if there is a perduring her stay in Naples, was culpably ditition it must needs yawn for such as you !' Her eyes were ablaze with wrath.

him, why, it was no affair of Madame la She looked weird, unearthly, terrible. Surely a more teartul malediction was never breathed than that which she was hissing into the ear of Death.

* * * *

The servants at the golden horn were only just coming downstairs, when Dr. Browne, pale and jaded, rode up to the door on horseback.

'Sir Patrick Donovan is in his room, I suppose ?' he said, and hurried up the stairs, and tapped at the baronet's door. It was opened in a moment by Sir Patrick, fully dressed.

'Well, my boy, what news ?' he questioned, gravely. as he drew the doctor inside the room.

'I have had a night of horror !' replied the doctor.

'Is the poor man dead ?' 'Yes. He died at sunrise.'

'And have you discovered anything ?'

'I have discovered everything. The man made a full confession before he died. Sir Patrick, I tell you honestly, I shouldn't like to have such another experience in my terrible, the most mysterious, that it is possible for the mind of man to conceive. Even to you I am not at liberty to reveal all that I have heard. But I may tell you this one thing, at any rate-that unfortu-nate young lady is Miss Kate Lisle. She has been the victim of the most diaobolical plot I have ever heard of in my life.'

'And where is she now ?' 'She is in safe keeping. But, for the present, I can scarcely spare so much as a thought to her. The person I want to see

CHAPTER LXVIII.

THE SHADOW OF DEATH.

A beautiful white house overlooking the Bay of Naples, though two or three miles from the town-a bouse with orange garand white marble balustrades.

It was the house Sir Gerald Vere had taken for himself and his wife during their stay in Italy.

In one of the shady rooms, whose hangings were of rose-coloured silk, Lady Vere lay on a couch, with a book in her hand which she was not reading, and her eyes fixed dreamily on the flower-wrerthed columns of the piazza.

Her face was as lovely as ever it had been; but there was upon it now a look of langour, of delicacy, which seemed to bint that her health, either of body or mind, was not so perfect as it had been in England.

A servant entered with a visitor's card. She looked at it, and seemed to consider for a moment or two, then she said-'I will see Madame la Comtesse. Bring

'Bah! What a superstitous dreamer you In her heart of hearts she thought that are !' Sir Gerald, judging from what she had seen

'I seem so to you, you mean, because you look only on the surface; and, as I've told you thousands of times, you haven't the true artistic soul. To you Vinadi's miaden is simply a girl in perfect health. You note her ruddy lip, and perfect skin, and cannot see that he has painted her doom in her eyes. But, this I will say, you never see that look in the elderly or midele-aged. Whosever has it, is the favcurite of the gods, inasmuch as they die young. Yon beautiful lady will never wear the mark of Time's furrow on her brow.'

Lady Vere, gently. 'I can dress in ten minutes, if you don't mind waiting.' 'What nonsense! I declare you grow In a very little more than ten minutes worse every day.'

And then the two friend sauntered from the two ladies drove away together, the the gallery together. French countess petite, vivacious, and alpogether chic: Sir Gerald's beautiful wife

The countess and Lady Vere lingered for half-an-hour among the pictures, then re-entered the former's carriage.

'You will go home with me ?' said the countess.

bunch of Neapolitian violets at her throat. 'Thank you; but, if you will excuse me, will return home at once. I am feeling a Not another touch of color about her, little tired, and not quite well.'

The countess, for all her elegance, and 'You are certainly very pale,' said the countess, with ready sympathy. 'You shall in spite of the fact that her maise-coloured do just as you please then, ma chere; but, carriege costume was one of Worth's own remember, I am expecting you at my 'At designing, narrowly escaped looking vulgar by contrast with that pale, tranquil Home' to morrow.

They were driving by the side of a cemetery, and, at this moment, a coffin, borne on four men's shoulders, was being carried in at the gate.

The countess's coachman had to rein in his horses to allow the mournful cortege to In a garden, of exquisite beauty, a girl was standing, bending over a sundial, on pass.

'They say it is unlucky to have to make which was inscibed the legend: 'Life is way for a coffin,' said the countess, briskly. 'However, thank goodness, I am not superstitious. There are heaps of stupid people who would say this forboded an early death to either you or me.'

Lilian had been pale before, but she grew paler than ever as she watched the coffin being carried, slowly, to the grave. Every vestige of color seemed to have eft her face.

She was pallid, even to the lips.

'My dear, I am atraid you are ill,' said the countess, with good-natured concern. 'Surely you are not superstituous, my love; you are not alarmed because of that ?'

And she nodded her head in the direction of the coffin.

Liliam seemed to recover herself with a great effort.

gently; 'but we seem to have seen and heard of nothing but death this afternoon. innermost secret of her soul. It has pursued us like a spectre. First, that picture; now, this coffin. It was a cypress leat that fell into the carriage a moment | I thought it was true !' ago; and, see! there is a raven on that tree just above our heads.'

'My dear child, you are nervous. I shall positively recommend you to consult Dr. Naples and nerves are his speciality. He will look in at my 'At Home' to-morrow. I shall certainly have to talk to him about you.'

a warning note it seemed to that beantiful, pale-faced woman, for she clasped her white hands together in an agony of appeal, and looked at him with the eyes which might surely have moved to pity the flintiest heart that ever beat in the breast of man.

It was as though she knew that his passions were like caged beasts within him and might, at any moment, break loose from restraint- Yes trust me,' she cried, falling on her kneese at his feet, and clasping one of his hands tightly in both her own. ,I am your wife, Gerald! Your wife! Oh, my husband, remember that !'

'I do remember it,' he said, in a sombre tone, still averting his eyes from her pale, lovely tace, with its veil of golden hair. 'God in Heaven ! why does she remind me of it? Am I likely to forget?'

Still she clasped his hand; nay, she pressed her lips to it, timidly, and as though she feared to anger him.

'Dearest, if you would but let me prove to you how cruelly you are wronging me !' she pleaded.

He laughed sardonically, a bitter, mocking laugh.

'Gerald, I can prove it. Oh, believe me? I swear that I am innocent.'

'Liar !' he hissed betwaen his clenched teeth, and would have thrust her from him with a fierce, almost brutal, movement, if she had not clung to his hand.

He was fast lashing himself into a condition of ungovernable fury,

The light of madness seemed to leap out of those darkly brilliant eyes.

His lips were livid and drawn.

'Gerald,' she breathed in a pathetic whisper her voice breaking into a sob, 'if you only knew how much I need your love and kindness now !'

'Her lovely head drooped lower and lower till it all but rested on his knee.

'Gerald,' she panted again, be kind to me-be kind to me and love me as you used to do. I need your love-you do not know how much. If you will not love me, I shall be glad to die: but I want to live, for, before-this-year-has gone-I shall -have a-little-child.'

Slowly, and almost inaudibly, the words fell from her lips.

Lower and lower drooped her beautiful head as she uttered them.

For one moment Sir Gerald seemed not to grasp her meaning.

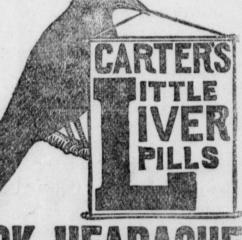

When Sir Gerald grasped her meaning, he leaned suddenly forward, and, sweep-'I am not superstitious,' she said, very ing back the veil of golden hair, looked into her face as though he would read the

> 'If I thought it was true!' he breathed from between bis set teeth. 'My God! if Quite early the next morning, a rumour ran through Naples, like wildfire, that the beautiful wife of Sir Gerald Vere had been Ramonzi. He is the cleverest physician in found dead in her bed-poisoned by an

CHAPTER LXIX.

Positively cured by these Little Pills.

They also relieve Distress from Dyspepsia, Regulate the Bowels. Purely Vegetable.

Indigestion and Too Hearty Eating. A perfect remedy for Dizziness, Nausea, Drowsiness, Bad Taste in the Mouth, Coated Tongue Pain in the Side, TORPID LIVER. They

BY THE SIDE OF THE DEAD.