Continued from Tenth Page. toilet-table, then rested on the face of the woman standing by it.

'You are very proud,' she said. 'You think a great deal of yourself and your belongings; but I would not give that'with a significant snap of the fingers-'to be standing in your shoes.'

For a moment Lady Metherell stared at her in blank amazement, then with a quick firm step, crossed the room, and laid her hand upon the bell.

'I advise you not to ring at once,' Cora said, calmly, swinging one foot back-wards and forwards. 'Hear me first. I think you will find what I have to sayinteresting. It concerns Sir Martin Metherell. When we first met, you imagined I knew something of his acquaintance with my mother. You pressed me to remain for that reason. It did not suit me to speak then, though it suits me now. Are you prepared to listen?"

Lady Metherall had grown as white as the curtains draping the windows. She made a silent gesture of assent.

Cora smiled. To have this cold haughty woman at her mercy was triumph indeed. 'It is not a pleasant tale,' she said. 'Perhaps your ladyship will not hold up her head quite so high when she heard it. A short time ago Sir Martin brought to this house a young man-Vivian West by name. You look surprised, you wonder what he has to do with my story. You are very dense, Lady Metherell, or you would have surely noticed the strange interest your busband took in this young man. When he was in the room he had no eyes for anyone else-when he spoke, he had no care for other voices. Do you know why? Be cause he was his own flesh and blood-his own son.'

Lady Metherell was standing rigidly upright, her bands clenched till the knuckles stood out like polished ivory.

'You lie!' she hissed. 'How dare you bring such a shameful talsehood to me! Cora shrugged her shoulders.

'It is a big pill to swallow,' she said.
'But it has to go down, for there is yet a stronger one to come. All these years Sir Martin has kept his secret. Only one other person knew it besides himself—that person was my mother. She came here for the purpose of seeing him. Doubtless an agony of entreaty in his frantically utshe threathened to expose him. You know | tered words, as he gathered her fingers in how she was silenced. He murdered her. Sir Martin has confessed to this. He shall repeat the confession before you. Perhaps, then, you will agree—as he has already done—to my terms.'

Cora watched the effect of her words. She had expected a scene, and was rather taken aback by the stony calm with which Lady Metherell confronted her. 'Have you finished?'

'Unless you wish for a more detailed account of your husband's crimes.'

'I wish for nothing,' Lady Metherell replied, in that dead level voice, 'except to be alone. Will you kindly leave my Cora jumped up. 'Oh, with pleasure! I have no desire to stay. I will wait till one o'clock for your consent to my marriage with your son. If everything is not settled satisfactorily by that time, I shall have to tell him also the story. Lady Metherell neither moved nor spoke and the girl, with a jeering, taunting laugh, left her.

Outside the door she put her ear to the keyhole, but there was still no sound. 'Ma foi, she is made of iron!' she inwardly exclaimed. 'Dear, dear, am I not clever-I, who know so little, to have them all under my thumb?

Ten minutes later, and Lady Metherell's maid was startled by the loud ringing of her mistress's bell. She hastened to the room, to find her lying on the floor, insensible, the broken bell-rope in her hand. The next instant, the house was echoing to the woman's frantic screams for help. Lady Metherell was in a fit.

She was laid on her bed, and the doctor summoned, but it was beyond his power to restore consciousness. 'It looks as if she had received some great mental shock,' he said to Sir Martin. Do you know it such is the case? Mademoiselle Rozier saw her last, the maid tells me. May I see her?'

Sir Martin groped his way blindly to the bell, and rang it. He knew all now.

He knew what Cora had done. She came in, atter a time, her eyes red as it she had been crying; she had taken

********

IT'S ALL IN THE POLISH.

Why Do Some Shoes SHINE BETTER THAN OTHERS?

It's not in the leather. It is in the quality of the polish.

SPECIAL Combination Leather Dressings

are the kind that give the best shine and the longest life to your shoes.

All colors, Brown, Tan, Russet, Ox Blood and Box Calf.

*************

PACKARD MAKES IT PACKARD OF MONTREAL L. H. PACKARD & CO.

some trouble to make them look like that. The doctor began at once.

'I understand you were the last who saw her ladyship before this seizure?' Cors drew out her handkerchief.

'That is true I sat in her room-she was going out-she seemed quite well.' 'Did she seem happy? Did you notice anything unusual?'

'No; we were talking.' 'On ordinary topics?'
'We spoke of Monsieur West. I told her something I knew of him-an amusing little anecdote. We talked also of Sir Martin. Then I left her.'

'It is most extraordinary,' the doctor muttered. 'I cannot account for it. There is no doubt that Lady Metherell is in a most dangerous condition. I should like to have other advice.'

That afternoon, three doctors came and held a consultation over the still unconscious woman.

She might recover consciousness-she might live, they said; but in all probability she would die as she was.

There was nothing to be done, but to watch and wait. In the gray twilight of the dying day, Sir Martin Metherell sat beside his wite's bed, watching, with sad, remorseful eyes, her pallid, drawn face.

He had brought her to this-he knew it. The story of his sin had stricken her

Were the evil fruit of his deed to have no end? he wondered, despairingly. If but, in the hour of his temptation, he could have forseen the consequences, how much he might have been saved? He had never cared for the woman lying so strangely still upon her handsome bed but they had spent twenty-two years of life together. She had been a good wife to him, and now they were parting for ever-and through him.

Death and destruction seemed to follow in his path.

His thoughts became too bitter and awful for endurance. The air of the quiet, shadowy room seemed to strifle him. Then the white hand resting on the silken coverlet moved, and Lady Metherell's eyes slowly opened and rested upon him.

He bent eagerly forward. 'Clara!-wite!' he whispered, hoarsely his. 'My poor girl!' He never torgot the expression which grew upon her face-such horror, such aversion, that he sank upon his knees, bow ing his head to shut out the sight of it. And when, at length, he litted it again, Clara, Lady Metherll, had passed away.

CHAPTER XVII.

It was summer again.

The roses were in bloom, and tall white lilies scented the warm, balmy air.

Sir Henry and Lady Ayerst had wintered abroad, and, after a gay London season, had come down to Royal Heath for six weeks' rest, if a house full of visitors, and a long list of engagements, could be called

But Lady Ayerst was a leading beauty and a woman of fashion, and could not do as humbler folk, even though there had come upon her a strange longing for the quiet and peace of Fairfield.

She drove over there one day, and sat in the trim little garden, so sweet and odorous with its borders of old-fashioned flow-

There was no sound but the cooing ci the pigeons on the stable roof. Daisies stared up at the blue sky from the smooth green lawn. The daisies were an eye sore to Mrs. Loraine; she regretted their presence as she sat beneath the tree with her daughter. 'They are a perfect pest. It seems impossible to get rid of them. They entirely spoil the lawn.' Madge stuoped, and, plucking one, daintily picked it to pieces. 'I believe Shirley,' she said, 'thinks they improve the look of it.' Shirley never thinks the same as other people,' Mrs. Loraine declared, impatiently. 'She is the most self-willed, headstrong girl I have ever met with. It breaks my heart when I think of how she has wilfully thrown away her chances. She might have been married now, had she not been such a little tool. My dear Madge, I cannot express to you my feelings when I see that nasty, black eyed little Frenchwoman, driving about in the Metherell carriages, and giving berself the airs of an empress. They are to be married this summer. It is shameful. Had only poor Lady Metherell lived, things would have been very differ- while every atom of color fled from her ent; but I really believe Sir Martin is out face.

of his mind.' 'When do you expect Shirley home?" Madge asked.

She was rather tired of the Metherell Every letter had mother had written for the last six or seven months had contained 'Next week,' Mrs. Loraine replied, with a peevish puckering of her brows. 'I trust she will not be home for long. I feel too angry with the child to want her here.' 'Poor Shirley!' Lady Ayerst remarked, as she dropped the daisy-head on to the grass. 'You had better send her to me when she returns do tor her.' 'But, Sir Henry ?' 'He can scarcely object to my own sister.

But, it you remember, dear, they were never at all friendly-'And are never likely to be,' Madge said with an odd little laugh. 'I shall expect h r next week.' It was about eight days later that Shirley went to Royal Heath. She was delighted at the prospect of seeing her sister again.

It seemed to her the first pleasant thing that had occurred since she had walked behind her as chief bridesmaid up the aisle | the little kitchen, and the dull, ceaseless of Coddington Church.

And yet, as they met, her first feeling was one of disappointment. Madge had altered.

She seemed to have grown taller, prouder, haughtier. She was exquisitely dressed, and had the quiet, self-possessed manners of a grand Shirley felt that Madge Loraine had gone for ever.

Lady Ayerst was quite a different person. 'You are very quiet,' Madge said, as they drove from the station to Royal Heath. What is the matter with you?"

'I am rying to get used to you,' Shirley answered. 'You have altered so entirely, 'I can't believe you are Madge.'

'I am hardly believe it myself sometimes, the elder girl said, and a shadow fell across her lovely face. 'Do you know, I rather like looking back to the days when an imitation pearl necklace, and a wee diamond heart, constituted nearly the whole of my iewellery P'

'They constitute almost the whole of mine,' Shirley laughed. 'They are certainly the most valuable of my possessions.' 'It is your own fault.'

'I know that.' 'Why did you do it?' Shirley's eyes darkened.

'Why? Why, because I felt I would rather drown myself in the nesrest pond than marry him. I-I could not like him in that way; it was no use; and I'm not like you-I don't care so much about being rich. would rather be free.'

Lady Ayerst bowed to a passing friend, then she said-

'Perhaps you were right, and it really does not matter, now that I am in a position to take you into society. You are certain to have some good chances.'

'I don't want any, thanks. I have made up mind to be an old maid.'

Madge laughed. 'My dear child,' don't be so absurd. You an old maid! What a future to look forward to! You want a tonic, Shirley, for I am certain you must be in a very weak state of health to have such morbid notions.'

'You have not altered so very much, after all,' Shirley said. 'That is just the way you used to talk.'

'Is it? Well, I honestly think it is you who have really changed the most. I can't quite make you out. You have not been very happy lately, have you?' 'Oh, I have been all right!' Shirley delared: but her lip quivered, and Madge She wondered why it was, and what the reason could be for the change in her young

Her mother's disappointment and querulous temper could hardly have wrought it, especially as Shirley had been so much

She glanced at the pretty, delicate face, with its strangely wistful eyes.
Was it possible she had formed an entanglement with some undesirable young

Her thoughts went back to the artist, who had suddenly sprung into such favour. They had met him several times in town; but, until this moment, Madge had forgotten that he and Shirley had been friends. Had she cared for him so much—aid she still care for him?

It was not likely, and yet-well, Shirley was not quite like anyone else. She thought of that night when the girl had come sobbing to her-and then the carriage drew up before the portals of Royal Heath, and the powdered footman had sprung from the box, and was opening the door.

Madge led the way up the broad steps to the great entrance-hall, on the threshold of which a solemn and portly butler was 'The ladies are in the morning-room,' he informed his mistress.

There was also a telegram for her ladyship, which a very tall tootman gravely handed to her on a heavy silver salver. She opened it in a leisurely way as she crossed the hall, saying to Shirley, as she

'Henry is in town, you know. I dare say this is to say we are not to expect him

Then her eyes fell on the message, and a slight exclamation of surprise escaped

'Not bad news?' Shirley asked. 'No-oh, no!'

She turned to the butler. 'Bodkin, the master is coming by the six-twenty. He is bringing a gentleman with him. I think, Shirley, you have met him before-Vivian West, the artist.' The announcement was so entirely unexpected that the girl could only repeat, in a hoarse little whisper, 'Vivian West!' Madge, under pretence of speaking to a favourite dog, gave her time to recover She had very quickly discovered the cause of Shirley's altered appearance and Well, he was a rising man, and likely to become a great one-perhaps a rich one-but Shirley might have done so much bet-It was a thousand pities Sir Henry had chosen to invite him just now.

Thought passes so quickly. Lady Ayerst had surveyed the position of affsirs, had weighed the for and against, hile she patted her poodle's head.

A minute later she was introducing Shirley to her friends, who bowed, and smiled, and shook hands with a mechanical graciousness, while the girl's heart seemed to throb out in passionate pain the name of Vivian West.

It appeared to her that long, weary years had passed since they two had parted on that wild autumn afternoon.

She could teel again the driving snow upon her face, as she stood outside the cottage-door, straining her eyes for a last glimpse of him as he strode through the storm, and then, afterwards, the quiet of ache that had been with her ever since.

She had tried to forget him-had tried to interest herself in other people; but it had been in vain, and now at last, in a few short hours, they were to meet again. She knew not whether she was glad or

It meant an intensity of suffering. And yet, her whole soul thrilled with the thought of seeing him again. Someone was speaking to her—the lady by whom she was sitting, and whose presence she had forgotten.

The low, rather complaining voice recalled her to the fact that she was sitting in a room-full of people. 'Such a beautiful day, is it not?' said

'So hot,' she added with a sigh. 'I cannot stand the heat.' 'You prefer the winter?' Shirley said, the lady, as it it were a thing to be de-striving to show some interest. :Oh, no; the cold kills me-I perish, I die! I am a great invalid, you know,' with a charming smile. 'It is only by the exertion of doctors and nurses that I manage to exist at all. I have one with me | you-loved you with all her heart. now, such a dear creature-a perfect ladyso clever and capable. I should simply die this really true! She loved me-she?"

if she left me.' It seemed to Shirley, who little guessed arm with such force that it hurt her. who her companion was, that the lady's life really hung on a thread, and that she she made recalled him to himself.

might expire at any moment. The stranger was a little slip of a woman, with large pale blue eyes.

Later, Shirley discovered that she was Sir Henry's sister, who had just come from India, where she had left her husband. Tea was brought in while they sat there by the open windows, and a party of men and girls, returning from a fishing expedition, sat on the grassy slope outside, and no recollection of what I said or did, but related their day's sport.

They were all very merry. Everyone seemed in the highest of spirits, even the tragile invalid found strength to join in the general laugh that now and to make her a good husband one of these again broke forth. They were all strangers to Shirley; at you have stirred up the old feverish madleast, she thought so, till a tall man, entering by one of the windows, came up to her and held out his hand.

Loraine. It was Harold Ridley. Shirley gave him the very coldest of welcomes; she could not forgive him for be-

'I am so glad to meet you again, Miss ing engaged to Eva Ware. But, in spite of her freezing reception, he seated himself beside her and entered into conversation.

As he talked, she noticed that he looked anything but happy. There were deep lines about his eyes and mouth, which she did not remember noticing before. He had, too, a reckless air of dissipation has unmanned me. Do you mind returning and was altogether quite unlike the Harold Ridley of a year ago.

Eva Ware had not improved him, Shirley thought; and then she wondered how he could have chosen a girl like that, when he might have had Lucy Brend. Afterwards, when tennis was proposed, and everyone made a move for the garden, he sauntered out with her, and as they strolled along one of the smooth gravel paths, he inquired after the girl Shirley was thinking of. 'Have you heard from Miss Brend lately?' 'I have just been staying with her.'

'Is she not married yet? 'Not yet.'

'I-I suppose she will be soon!' 'I suppose so.' He smoothed his moustache, and they alked on in silence. 'Have I offended you?' he asked at last. 'No; how could you?' 'You gave me the impression that you were not pleased to see me.' Shirley flushed; then, in her old impulsive way, just blurted out the truth. 'The fact is, you are going to marry someone I don't like. Miss Ware and I were always deadly enemies.' 'And you now extend the feeling to me. Surely you, of all people, might have been little kinder ?' Shirley looked at him in astonishment. 'Why?' 'Because,' he said, with a short harsh laugh,' 'you know the truth. You are

Miss Brend's friend.' 'I only know this,' she said, and her voice shook a little with excitement, 'you showed my friend a great deal of attention then suddenly proposed to someone else.' 'You know why. 'I do not' Shirley protested. 'It has always puzzled me. It there was any reason for the strange way in which you behaved, tell me.'

Of what use to do so?' he asked with a

The above is the name and trade mark of the original Kidney Pill.

The only reliable Kidney Pill. They were placed on the market by Mr. James Doan, Kingsville, Ont., February, 1885-long before other Kidney Pills were thought of.

Their phenomenal success in all parts of the world, as well as in Canada, has brought forth many imitations. Take nothing that has a name that looks or sounds like D-O-A-N-'S.

Always ask for D-O-A-N-'S Kidney Pills-the pills that quickly and thoroughly cure all kinds of Kidney ills after other remedies fail.

shrug of the shoulders. 'There is nothing to be gained by raking up the follies of a year ago. I thought you knew. imagined she had told you. I thought a girl of that sort would naturally talk over her conquests.'

Shirley stood still in the pathway. 'Mr. Ridley,' she said 'are you mad ?' 'I was for the space of one night,' he answered. 'I am sane enough now.' 'And you believe that Lucy Brend thought she had made a conquest of you?' She tooled me till she got me to her feet, and, the very night she led me on to tell her how I loved her, she accepted

Dorrien. They say all women are cruel. Nothing could have been more deliberate or cold-blooded than that.' 'It is all a mistake.' Shirley cried. 'She loved you better than anyone. I know

He laughed incredulously.

'It looked like it !' 'It is true,' she persisted. I know all about it. It isn't my secret. I dare not tell you without her sanction; but she loved

'Great Heaven !' he exclaimed. 'Is In his agitation, he was grasping her The involuntary movement of pain that

'Forgive me !' he cried; 'I scarcely know what I am doing. How can I believe what you tell me, when I have the evidence of my senses to the contrary? Do you know what happened? Are you aware that, the night on which I was mad enough to think she cared for me, I found her in Dorrien's arms? Neither saw me; but I-my God I shall never forget that moment—I have Eva. Poor girl! She has a deuced bad bargain—a man who cannot offer her the smallest grain of affection. But I meant days. I was growing reconciled, and now ness. I believed Lucy false and heartless and you have raised a doubt,' He sank on to a rustic bench they had come to, and buried his face in his hands. Shirley longed to tell him the whole truth of the case, yet dared not.

The better plan would be, she thought to bring these two together, and let them clear up the misunderstanding between them; then, surely, all would come right. She laid her hand gently on the man's shoulder.

noticed his atitude of utter dejection. He lifted his hrggard face for a moment, and looked at her. 'You are very kind,' he said; 'but this

Her tender heart ached with pity, as she

She went at once. The birds were singing, and the grassy slopes of Royal Heath lay like bright green velvet in the brilliant sunshine. As she walked slowly and thoughtfully back to the house, she came upon the invalid, reclining in a hammock chair, a person in the garb of a hospital nurse, attending upon her. 'All alone !' the lady exclaimed, with languid playfulness. What have you done with that fascinating Mr. Ridley? He is such a charming fellow, is he not ?-

but engaged. So, my dear, you must not set your affections on him. This is my nurse-Nurse Patience. She richly deserves the name I am sure. Shirley held out her hand to the woman standing by the invalid s casir—a slender slip of a woman, with a delicate refined face, her eyes shaded with dark glasses. Shirley telt a keen desire to see behind those disfiguring spectacles. There was a someting about Nurse Patience that attracted her, she could not tell why-or why she seemed familiar.

'Is it possible—can I have met you before ?' she asked. 'It is impossible-yes; but I don't think you have. I seldom torget a face and yours is quite strange to me. The voice was low and tuneful; there were tones in it which made you long to hear it again, She went away to fetch cushions for the nvalid, Gildare, who immediately lanched into praise of her attendant. 'Is she not charming? Am I not fortunate to have secured her services? I am entirely dependant upon her for everything. She is one of the nurses in a big institution. A marvel to me, that a woman like that has never married; but she seems wedded to her work, and, I dare say, has some untortunate love affair.

'You should see her eyes, my dearsuch beautiful tragic things! I am annoyed with her for wearing those hideous glasses. She has only taken to them since we came here. Well, perhaps it is just as well, with so many men about. 'What is your name, my dear? I have heard it, but quite forget it. I really cannot call you Miss Loraine; it is too much exertion. Besides, we are connections by marrage, you see. Shirley is it? Well now, Shirley, sit down there; it is only a footstool, but quite comfortable, I am sure and let us have a quiet chat.' Lady Gildare's idea of a quiet chat was to babble aimlessly to anyone who would listen to ber, and Shirley was becoming intorerably bored when Nurse Patience came to the rescue, with the cushions, and a message from Lady Averst, to the effect that Miss Loraine was wanted. 'I thought you would be bored to death when I heard you were in the clutches of Louisa Gildare,' Madge said. 'So I told the nurse to send you iv. Would you like to go to your room, and have a rest before dinner? You are looking tired, and I want you to be at your best to-night. as it is your first appearance here.' Shirley was glad to have a little time to herself before the ordeal of meeting the man she loved.

To be Continued.

The easier a women cries, the less it means.