The Grocer's Picnic.

The Grocer's picnic has come and gone and 3000 people went to Watters Landing to enjoy the fun. It was a great effort on the part of the grocers and entailed much work and but little if any enjoyment to the active members of the committees.

The grounds are well suited for the purpose, and there was a good programme of sports. There was too much fighting and too much liquor. This will not occur again because it is possible to prevent toughs and the residents of Sheffield street from getting on the boats.

The police know who are fighters and they know the utterly disreputable women too. Both classes are far better absent. The grocers can be congratulated upon the popularity of their annual outing. They will know how to make it better another year.

A Monster at the "Cedars."

A small animal well known to the people of New Brunswick created a sensation at the "Cedars" up river last Sunday evening as a church was getting out. The advance party of home-ward bound churchgoers scented the much-feared tiny monster, and turning back spread the alarm. Hay fields were invaded and potato patches trampled upon in taking round about ways of getting past the dreaded obstruction. Some walked a half mile in an out-of-the-way sweep to make sure the little animal was at a safe distance.

MAKING THE PLUNGE.

A Diver Tells of His First Descent to the Bottom of the Sea.

H. Phelps Whitmarsh, who met varying fortunes while earning a living in Australia confesses that, having resolved to be a pearl diver, he was exceedingly nervous during the days before his first descent. He knew there would be five irresponsible half savage Malays in the boat above him, and that under water he had only his own inexperience to rely upon. Therefore, he was none too confident. He says:

The night before the event I slept little, and after a light breakfast I proceeded to put on the diving dress. The rubber suit, which is coat, waistcoat, trousers and stockings all in one, must be entered through the neck. A thirty two pound pair of lead soled boots was next added to my costume, then the corset, or shoulder-piece, and the seventy pound back and chest weights.

Then the noose of the life-time was slipped around my waist, and I stepped on the rope ladder hanging over the boat's side, to have the air pipe and helmet attached. As the ringing copper globe was screwed on my shoulders, I began instinctively to take in long breaths at the open face-glass. I did not feel sure that I could get any more air.

"Pump away!" I shouted.

A warm stream of air, saturated with the smell of India rubber, came whizzing in at the top of the helmet.

"Alri!" asked the Malay, bringing his face to a level with mine.

I nodded. Instantly the face glass was slapped on and screwed tight. At that moment my courage dropped to the bottom of those leaden-soled boots, and I would have given the whole thing up had I not chanced to see the Malay grinning all over his yellow face at my discomfort.

The decided me, and I grasped the plumperline and dropped. Splash! The water closed over me with a buzzing sound, the dress tightened about my body, and all was green.

I felt, as it in a dream, that I was falling. A sharp pain pierced my ears, as if two spikes were being pressed into them. The deeper I sank the harder they pressed until I cried out in agony. Down, ever down, I went into the cooler, darker water. It glipped me tighter and tighter every moment.

A school of fish passed my face-glass. Like leaves swept by the wind. Would my kicking feet never touch bottom? Suddenly I found myself upon my knees. The pain in the ears had gone, and I scrambled to my feet, brimful of curiosity.

The water was clear as crystal, the earth a vast, cool conservatory of tropic sea-plants and flowers. I could see distinctly for thirty or forty feet. Beyond this, objects fell out of focus, and then faded into a green haze. The ground I stood upon was of coral structure, overgrown with a marvelous variety of seaweed, coral and sponge, in some cases as high as my head. Sea-fans, fern shaped corallines, sponge-cups, conches, brilliant anemones, quaint g-jases, strange blossoms, all rich in color and beautiful in form, lay, undisturbed by surface storms, in this silent garden of the sea.

Small gay colored fish flitted, hovered and darted about the growths like gorgeous butterflies.

For a time I forgot that I was of an other world, and wandered on and on like one in a fantastic dream.

Suddenly the Malay signalled to ask if I was all right, and at the same moment I came upon a bottle with a yellow label, standing upright upon a little ledge of rock. Then, for the first time, I began to realize my position.

My head was aching. Streams of perspiration were pouring down my face. I felt oppressed, and realized that I was gasping hard for air.

At that moment, seeing the length of rope behind me, I felt an indescribable loneliness. My thoughts dwelt upon submarine monsters, and I even conjured up huge forms approaching in the smoky distance. It was evident that I had been down long enough. So I screwed up the escape-valve, to make myself lighter, and gave the signal to be pulled up.

In a few moments I was greedily drinking in sea air through the open face-glass.
