The Soldier's Christmas.

Both the Union and the Confederate armies had gone into winter quarters, and the roads and fields of Virginia were covered with snow and ice. Just above one of our posts on the Rapidan was a farmhouse which held a woman and four children, and it had not taken us long to afraid. learn that the husband and father was in the Confederate Army. In a way, being within our lines, we protected those he had lett behind, but it was little we had to do with them. Now and then we saw the children about, looking for food or gathering fuel, and once when I was on post near the house I offered them pro visions from my haversack. They were shy, but hungry, and after a bit the oldest | was a false alarm. At least, I have found came forward and was about to take food | none so far. buildings and crops, and had reduced her and hers to beggary. There were hundreds of such cases in those dark days of woe, and thousands who wore the blue never missed an opportunity to lighten the burdens as far as lay in their power. The waste of a single company of soldiers would have fed two or three families like that; but, it the mother's pride stood in the way, we did not care to insult it by making advances. There was one thing I made up my mind to do, however. The woe-begone looks of the children appealed to my heart, and at Christmas time Santa Claus should remember them in spite of war and misfortune and poverty. The mother might refuse to open the door to my knock, but that would not thwart me. Unlike Santa Claus, I could not descend by the chimney and fill the waiting stockings, but I could call out and leave the things on the steps it refused admission. I was ready when the day came.

Through a comrade I had purchased toys in Washington, and from the regimental sutler I bought sweetmeats that all children love. I had my Santa Claus package made up, and had asked for a pass to leave the camp, when I found myselt detailed with a squad to march in the very direction I wanted to go. Lee was granting his men furloughs, and scores of Confederates whose tamilies were living within our lines were making attempts to visit them. Scouts and outposts had been cautioned to renewed vigilance, and squads were sent to search farmhouses for miles around. There were seven of us who marched out that night, under command of a sergeant, and we had two farms to search. It was orders, and orders to be obeyed, but no man's heart was in the work. A Confederate soldier in the field was an enemy, but a Confederate soldier unarmed and seeking bis fireside after a year's absence was a different matter. And, too, it was Christmas Eve, and as we trudged away through the snow and sleet we had visions of our own firesides in the North at that hour. I could not conceal my Santa Claus bundle, but the sergeant asked no questions. think be suspected from the first. We reached the first farmhouse about 9 o'clock As we drew up at the gate the sergeant

'It there's a Confederate in the house, we must capture him at any cost. You will station yourself so as to form a cordon, while I will advance to the door. Unless I call for assistance, you will all keep your places.'

The sergeant spoke in loud tones, and we made a great deal of noise in reaching our places, and it was 10 minutes after our arrival ere he knocked at the door. It was opened at once by a woman. There was a rousing fire on the hearth, with two children popping corn in the blaze, and fair in sight in the chimney corner were a pair of army-made shoes, a butternut-colored overcoat and a soldier's slouch hat. The owner of them could not be 30 feet away, but atter one glance the sergeant said :

'We heard there was a Confederate soldier here, madame, but it must be a mistake. I don't see him snywhere. Good night, and a merry Christmas to you all.

I stood next to the door and heard the words, and, reading the sergeant's heart, I made free to tell him of the contents of my bundle. He reflected for a minute and then replied:

Private Burns, to give sympathy and succor to the enemy is treason. Be careful what you do. You will scout on shead to the next farmhouse alone. We will follow a quarter of an hour behind you. Should the little money I have?" you discover a Confederate soldier in the house, fall back and wait for us to come

I understood, and I set out at once. The other house was only half a mile away. As I reached it I heard the songs and laughter of the children, and guessed that some event beyond the advent of Christmas Eve had occurred to bring happiness. like to get him one if I can sflord it. How I had thought to leave my parcel on the steps, knock on the door and go away, but I changed the plan and lifted the latch and boldly walked in. In tront of the fire sat the wife and mother, and beside her the husband and tather, while the children were decorating the room with pine branches. The man was in Confederate uniform, and I somehow felt that it had been less than an hour since he had entered the house, As he sprang to his feet there was a sort of groan from the woman | p'r'aps I could get something for a dollarand a cry in chorus from the children, Before me was the table, just as the reunited tamily had finished their wretched supper, and, advancing to it, I deposited my bundle and opened it.

'Oh! Richard! Richard!' moaned the wife, as she wrung her hands; but I gave her no attention.

Something for the children, 'I said, as I distributed the contents of the bundle on the table. 'I have children of my own in the North, and to night their stockings come down the chimney to fill them. Come little ones, see what I have brought !' The children looked, but they were

'Do you mean it. Yank-do you mean kindness was refused. After that the it?' hoursely whispered the soldier as he moved a step nearer.

'But they should not tarry too long,' I said. 'There may be other parties sent out within a night or two, and they may not be accompanied by a Santa Claus. Children, come and look over your gifts. There is a pile for each of you. There comes my comrades, but you need not

The sergeant knocked on the door, and I opened it, and as he stepped in I said: Sergeant, I have searched the house, and no enemies are concealed here.' 'Good!' he replied. 'And we will be marching back to camp. Madame, permit me to wish you and your children a merry Christmas, and to hope that the war will soon be over and you will see your husband again. Come, Private Burns; let us go.'

We went out, and between the door and the gate he halted me to say: 'Private Burns, did you leave a bundle of Christmas things for the children?' 'I did, sir,' I replied. 'And a bavereack full of coffee, sugar, pork and hardtack ?" 'The same, sir.'

'And you rearched the house and found no enemies ? Not an enemy, sir.

'Private Burns, I am inclined to think, on the one hand, that you could be courtmartialed and shot full of holes; but, on the other, I am inclined to believe that it won't happen for the next ten years to come. Forward, march! and let's get back to camp !'

An Amused Foe.

The proprietor of a small store in New York owns a black kitten that cultivates a habit of squatting on its haunches, like a bear or a kangaroo, and then sparring with its forepaws as it it had taken lessons from a pugilist. The Telegram tells how the kitten conquered a big dog.

A gentleman took into the store an enormous black dog, half Newfoundland, half Collie, tat, good-naturad and intelligent. The tiny kitten, instead of bolting at once for shelter, retreated a few paces, sat erect on its hind legs and put its 'fists' in an attitude of defiance.

The concrast in size between the two was intensely amusing. It reminded one of Jack the Gtant-Killer preparing to demolish a giant.

Slowly and without a sign of excitability the huge dog walked as far as his chain would allow him and gazed intently at the kitten and its odd posture. Then, as the comicality of the situation struck him, he turned his head and shoulders around to the spectators, and if animal ever laughed in the world that dog assuredly did so then and there. He neither barked nor growled, but indulged in a low chuckle, while mouth and eyes beamed with merriment.

The big blond mechanic looked awkwark and out of place in the crowd of women shoppers at the toy counter. He seemed painfully conscious of the sharp contrast between his old working clothes and the stylish dresses of the ladies who jostled him on either hand. One given to studying the faces of Christmas shoppers would easily have read the question in his honest eyes. It was that everlasting question which makes Christmas the most pathetic as well as the happiest holiday in the year-the question, 'Can I do it with

At length the man caught the eye of a salesgirl and leaning over the counter, said in a low voice:

'Say, miss, I've got a little feller at home that's been talking for months about Santy Claus bringing him a horse. I'd much 15. this?' and he pointed to an equine paragon in front of him. 'That is three dollars,' said the salegirl. 'Best grade we've carried. You see it's covered with real horse-hide and has a real hair tail and mane.'

The mechanic shook his head hopelessly. 'Yes,' he said, it's a fine horse, all right, but I can't pay that much. I thought a smaller one, mebbe.'

'I'm sorry,' said the girl, sympathetically, cheaper kind this atternoon, and this is the the house of the Saviour, and on this, his Lower Argyle, Dec. 12, Herbert D McLarren to Mrs. Sadie Goodwin.

'My God! That I should be captured so only one that's left of the three-dollar lot.' first visit, he expected to see his Lord. Then suddenly her face lighted up. 'Oh, say,' she exclaimed, 'wait a minute!'

She dived under the table and came up with a counterpart of the horse they had been discussing; a counterpart, but with a broken leg and minus that very useful appurtenance, a tail. 'There,' she said, 'I will hang on the wall and Santa Claus will just happened to think of this! Somebody knocked it off the counter yesterday and broke the leg. The tail kept coming out anyway, and I guess it's lost now. You could have this for a dollar. Mebbe you could fix it all right.'

The man examined the fracture serious. ly. 'Why, that's easy,' he said. 'All it needs is to peel the hide up a little and splice the the leg and then put on some old Peter Cooper's salve. Make it as good as

'And perhaps you can get some horsehair and make a tail. They're just tied in a bunch and put in with a plug.'

'Oh, I'll fix that all right, miss. I've got an old bristle shaving brush that I can use. It'll be real stylish-one of them bobtailed coach horses. you know.'

They both laughed.

'You're mighty good miss, and I'm obliged to you.'

'Oh, that's all right,' said the girl. ') know how it is Christmas times myself, and she sighed as the customer turned happily away to play his part of Santa Claus, veterinary surgeon.

Acorn is an overgrowth of the horny layer of some portion of the skin of the foot, in duced by friction or undue pressure in one spot by the shoe. It is situated generally on a prominent portion of one of the toes, more commonly the little toe, bu may be on the sole of the foot or even on the ankle-bone.

It begins by an increase in size of the papillæ in the deeper part of the skin, and this induces an increase in the production of the scart-skin, or horny layer. The scarf-skin soon becomes inordinately thick, and, the pressure from the shoe continuing is pushed back against the enlarged papillae, causing their final atrophy.

This tormation o' a corn affords a curious illustration of the defeat of nature's well-meant efforts to prevent trouble; for the increased thickness of the horny layer is intended to afford protection to the enlarged and tender papillae, a purpose which would be well accomplished did the process stop there. But the friction by the shoe keeps up the irritatiou, and more and more of the horny covering is manufactured, until, instead of affording protection, it is actually the cause of all the

After a time the spot where the corn is seems to acquire a bad habit, and the tormation of the corn will go on even after the offending shoe bas been discarded.

The first thing to do for a corn is to get new shoes that are so snug as not to rub the feot anywhere, and so loose as not to make pressure in one spot more than in

The top of the corn may be pared with a sharp knife, extreme care being takenespecially in the case of the aged-not to Cut the sound akin; or it may be filed down to the level of the surrounding skin; or the entire corn may sometimes be loosened with a dull knife-blade or by the finger nail, and extracted from its bed.

When this cannot be done, removal may be facilitated by moistening the corn every other day with glacial acetic acid, the softened part being subsequently scrape d away with a dull knife or a small file. A salve containing salicylic soid, applied every right, will also frequently loosen the corn so that it can be pulled out. This is the basis of many of the popular corn

A soft corn, which is merely a corn that is always moist on account of its location on the inner surface of one of the toes, should be treated by keeping a piece of absorbent cotton between the toes so as to prevent maceration and by bathing it frequently with strong alum water.

Beguiling Childhood.

When my little son could scarcely walk, says Rev. C. T. Brady, a western missionary, I took him to the cathedral one cay, when I returned for something I had for gotten after morning service.

I left the child in the nave, and when I went back to him he had advanced halfway up the middle sisle, and was standing where the sun threw a golden light about his curly head. A tiny object he was in that great church.

It was very still. He was looking about in every direction in the most curious and eager way. To my fancy he seemed like a little angel when he said in his sweet, childish treble, which echoed and re-echoed beneath the vaulted roof: 'Papa, where's Jesus? Where's Jesus?' He had been told that the church was

That baby is quite grown up now. Not in the faintest particular does he resemble an angel. The other day, when I rode off to the wars, he astonished even me with Picton, Dec. 7, Ellen Gunn, 51. this request:

'Papa, if you get wounded, don't forget to bring me the bullet that knocks you out. I want it for a souvenir for my collection.

For unately for me, if unfortunately for him, I brought him no bullet.

"Verbal," all Round.

Here is a story which a threatrical manager tells sgainst himself. An actor came to him and applied for an engagement. There did not seem to be much need of him, but his demands in the way of salary were very modest, and the manager said

"Well, you may consider yourself engaged. I fancy I can find something for you to do."

The newly engaged man looked at the manager questionably.

"How about a contract?" he asked. "Oh, never mind a contract! We'll have a verbal contract."

There was a look of mild reproach in the eyes of the man as he snswered sorrowfully; "Sir, the last time I made a verbal contract I drew a verbal salary."

A Severe Lesson.

'I suppose that when you are facing the audience across the footlights you forget everything except your art?'

'Well,' answered Mr. Stormington Barnes, 'I used to talk that way about it. But I once had a treasurer who tried to take advantage of my forgettulness, so I endeavor to express my artistic enthusiasm, as it were, a little more conservatively.'

Bachelier-What are you going to put in your children's stockings this Christman? Phamilan-Huh! It takes all my money to keep the children in them.
