CAVES IN AFRICA.

Discoveries in German East Africa Not far From the Indian Ocean.

Mr. P. Chaudoir writes from Africa of some interesting limestone caves that have been discovered in the forest a few miles west of Tanga, one other parts of German East Africa. These caverns have long been known to the natives but the attention of white men has only recently been called to them.

The cavern of which Mr. Chaudoir particularly speaks has a very large opening on the side of a cliff with a river flowing out of it. Only a short distance within the opening the roof suddenly rises to a height of about 200 feet and along the side walls are passageways leading through great widenings in the rock which form enormous rooms.

The same difficulty has been found in exploring these caverns that are usually encountered in caves of tropical countries. In some of these passageways the walls are covered with legions of bats. Mr Chaudoir writes that it is no exaggeration to say there are millions of these animals covering the rock walls like a tapestry.

At a little distance the stone seems to be hidden under black earth, which is nothing however but this agglomeration of bats. Many of them are extremely large. One, which was killed by a blow with a stick, measured from tip to tip of the wings about four feet. Its body was as large as that of a owl.

Disturbed by the torches of the explorers hundreds of the bats take wing, flying against the men and compelling them often to beat a hasty retreat. Their cries are so deafening that the men though shouting at the top of their voices can not hear one another.

Under these circumstances it has not yet been possible to make any thorough exploration of the caves. Some underground lakes, however, have been discovered and several rivers which have been traced to the places where they issue into the open air. One of the caves has seven entrances within a distance of less than half a mile.

On several occasions when the men have penetrated a considerable distance underground the flight of startled bats has extinguished their torches and the explorers have been compelled to grope their way back to the exit. Mr. Chaudoir says these caverns are worthy of thorough exploration and he believes they equal in extent and interest some of the most famous caverns of France.
